Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I think it is my duty to put upon the record of the Senate to-day, I hope once for all, what I think I can do in two minutes, the refutation of the marvelous mathematical gambols which have been indulged in by the honorable Senator from Georgia [Mr. BROWN] to-day and the honorable Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL] yesterday.

The honorable Senator from Georgia has repeated, after being informed that he was mistaken over and over again he has reiterated, certain statements about the condition of things in Massachusetts, the number of voters who were disfranchised, or, to use his phrase, driven from the polls under our constitution. To-day he comes in fortified with the Massachusetts census of 1875, and he took up, I should think, an hour in reading what he said he found there, and the result was that he asserted that the claim that we were providing a substantial education for all our citizens was untrue, which he based on one set of figures, and that a large number of persons, which he stated variously at one hundred thousand or one hundred and twenty thousand or one hundred and thirty-nine thousand, were disqualified from voting under the illiteracy and the other clauses of our constitution.

Now, Mr. President, this book which he has exhibited shows that there are 300,834 children between five and fifteen years of age in the State; that is what we call the school age. Of those children there were 46,266, less than one-sixth, who appear not to have attended school three months during the year—he says they are the sons of democrats—less than one-sixth of the whole number do not attend school, 46,000. More than one-fifth, however, of the number between five and fifteen would be accounted for by the children between five and seven years of age. As everybody knows, there is an increasing opinion that it is not well to put children to school at that early age, although the right to go begins at five years. Then the number of children who by that census did not attend school in that State in that year is very considerably less than the number between five and seven years old. So much for that.

Now, let us take his marvelous statement about the persons disqualified from voting by illiteracy. The whole number of illiterates in the State of Massachusetts, foreign-born, alien, and native, over ten years old, by this very volume which the Senator held in his hand, is 41,120 males. Deducting from that number those between ten and twenty-one, which would be about one-fourth, you have about thirty thousand, and that is in the State where the number of unnaturalized foreigners is greater in proportion than in any other State of the Union, I believe. We have a vast immigration landing at Boston; three steamers started in a day last week from Boston to Liverpool, to come back with immigrants on their return. There is a weekly line constantly plying, a favorite of immigrants. In addition to that we have a very large Canadian population who come down there and work in our factories and on our farms and who do not get naturalized. The whole number, aliens and citizens alike, of males over ten years old is but 41,000, and of males over twenty-one undoubtedly is only about thirty thousand, allowing one-fourth for those between ten and twenty-one. The same table shows that the number of those persons, giving illiteracy by place of birth, who were born in Massachusetts is 2,126, and of those 1,677 were born in Massachusetts of foreign parents. So that there are but 459 persons, by this very census, born in that State of American parents unable to read and write.

I suppose the honorable Senator from Georgia will get up to-morrow and rattle off that 139,000 from General Butler's brief after he has heard this and had his attention called to these figures; or some other Senator, I dare say, will do it. They have been answered, refuted, buried a dozen times, and it is an utterly ridiculous statement, if I may say that, with great respect to the honorable Senator, the wise Senator, who made it. I have a great opinion of the ability of the honorable Senator from Georgia as a man who can make an ingenious argument in a bad cause; if I should ever happen to have one I should like to get his assistance. But as a statistician, may the Lord deliver me from him. [Laughter.] I would not trust that honorable Senator, if he will permit me in all respect to say so, to count my chickens even before they were hatched. [Laughter.]

Mr. BROWN. I never count mine till they are hatched.

Mr. DAWES. I understand the Senator from South Carolina proposes to be ready in the morning with irrefragable proof of a corrupt bargain made on this side of the Senate; and, with that view, I move that we now adjourn.

Mr. BROWN. I trust the Senator will not cut off reply to his colleague in that way.

Mr. DAWES. Certainly, if we can have some more statistics from my friend from Georgia, I withdraw the motion. [Laughter.]

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President——

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator from Georgia will pardon me for one moment.

Mr. BROWN. Certainly.

Mr. BUTLER. I should like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts his authority for the statement he has just made as to myself.

Mr. DAWES. Why, Mr. President, the Senator from South Carolina wants the authority. Does he withdraw his statement?

Mr. BUTLER. No, sir.

Mr. DAWES. Have I misunderstood him? Has he not any irrefragable proof? If the Senator has it not, I beg his pardon.

Mr. BUTLER. As usual, the Senator studiously avoids to answer my question.

Mr. DAWES. Oh, no.

Mr. BUTLER. Yes, he does.

Mr. DAWES. I think I must have misunderstood him. I thought I heard him say he could prove it if he only had a chance, and for that purpose I moved an adjournment.

Mr. BUTLER. If the Senator understood me as saying I would do it to-morrow morning, he is certainly mistaken.

Mr. DAWES. "To-morrow, and to-morrow, and to-morrow." Let us have it to-morrow. Unless the Senator will assure us that, having it in his possession, he will not hide it from the public eye an hour, I cannot move to adjourn.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator shall have all that I have, and welcome.

Mr. DAWES. That is what I supposed. That was why I moved an adjournment.

Mr. BUTLER. And he will hear more than he wants to hear when I do.

Mr. DAWES. I do not think I shall. He cannot tell how much I like to hear from him. Now, Mr. President, I withdraw the motion to adjourn if I cannot have it on that condition.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President——

Mr. COKE. I ask the Senator from Georgia to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. BROWN. Certainly.

Mr. COKE. I desire to say that it is my intention to make a brief reply to the remarks of the honorable Senator from Maine so far as they affect the State I have the honor in part to represent; but it being late this evening, and not having been able to get the floor, I will take occasion as soon as I can get the floor to make a few remarks in reply.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, I confess I have been somewhat amused at the artful dodging of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] from the plain facts that appear on the records of his own State. I stated nothing about the number of children in Massachusetts who were not at school under five years of age. I spoke of the number between five and fifteen.

Mr. HOAR. I did not speak of any under five at all. We both spoke of the same time.

Mr. BROWN. I will simply read again from the book published by the authority of his own State and reiterate the statement I made just as I find it here, and he does not get away from the figures by talking about my statistics, or that he would not take my statistics, or that he would never employ me to count his chickens before they are hatched. As I replied, I never count my chickens till after they are hatched, and I never count the goslings at all. [Laughter.] But this book of Massachusetts reads thus:

Under school attendance is given the number of children attending school at least three months during the year ending May 1, 1875, and from the recapitulation——

Mr. HOAR. How many of them are there?

Mr. BROWN. Let me read:

from the recapitulation, on page 88, it is learned that the whole number of all ages is 282,784; 1,269 being under five years of age, 254,568 between five and fifteen, and 26,947 above fifteen. From the returns made to the board of education contemporaneously with the census returns, there appear to be 300,834 children between five and fifteen years of age in the State, and this number is fully sustained by the census. These statements indicate that there were 46,266 children in the State between five and fifteen years of age, who had not "attended school three months during the year ending May 1, 1875."

That is exactly the statement that I made before, and I now repeat it, that there were 46,266 children in Massachusetts during the year ending May 1, 1875, who did not attend school three months, if the records of Massachusetts are correct.

Mr. HOAR. Now will the Senator allow me to ask him if he does not see that if there are 300,000 between five and fifteen there must at least be 60,000 of that number under seven years of age; that is one-fifth of the whole ten years' period? Those that died afterward would make the proportion still less. So that all his statistics amount to is that while there are 60,000 children under seven, above five, there are 46,000 only between five and fifteen who did not attend school.

Mr. BROWN. I said nothing about those under seven. The Senator undertook to dodge out of it by talking about the number under seven. I made the statement that there were 46,266 children between five and fifteen who were not at school three months in the year. That was all the statement I made about it. The Senator gets up and attempts to controvert that by reasoning as to the proportion of the whole number under seven. I take the statistics just as I find them in a book published by the State of Massachusetts and they sustain my statement to the exact figure that I stated.

Now if I am wrong about the statistics, it is because the State of Massachusetts publishes that which is not true, and I take it she publishes correctly what is the true state of things within her own limits. If so, then there are over 46,000 children between five and fifteen who were not at school three months that year; and I said I supposed—I did not assert that—that they were mostly the children of those democrats or those persons who would vote the democratic ticket, as has been admitted here to-day, if they were allowed to vote at all. Now, how has the Senator denied my statement, or how has he controverted the statement? He has not denied what I read or convicted me of any mistake whatever.

Mr. HOAR. When the Senator states that he supposes that 46,000 are the children of the illiterate democrats or the other democrats, does he think I do not meet the point by pointing out that there are 60,000 of that number under seven years of age, and therefore that it is not only reasonable, but it seems to me absolutely certain to any reasonable mind, that a portion of that number were out of school because of their extreme youth?

Mr. BROWN. I am utterly astonished. I wish I could get figures into the Senator's head. I state the figures exactly as they are in the book, 46,000 and odd of the children of Massachusetts between five and fifteen were not at school three months in the year, and he meets that by saying, "Can I suppose that there was not a certain number under seven years of age?" How does that meet it? That is the merest quibbling on the face of the earth; it is the merest dodge. I care nothing about what the number under seven years of age may be. I am talking about the number between five and fifteen who did not attend school; and here is the proof that they did not, no matter how many you had under five or under seven, or over fifteen or twenty-one or any other age.

The statement I made, and it is fully corroborated and sustained by the book, is that there were that number between the ages mentioned, five and fifteen, who did not attend school three months. You have not controverted that, and you cannot; and that is all I say on this subject. You have made a vain effort. You have undertaken to muddy the waters like the cuttle-fish. When pursued it muddies the water behind it to keep the pursuer from being able to locate it. I think the honorable Senator has muddied the water very considerably here in talking about children of other ages; but he cannot get rid of the fact that according to the statistics of his own State there is that number between five and fifteen who were not at school, as I stated, three months during that year.

Mr. DAWES. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at five o'clock and six minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

THURSDAY, April 21, 1881.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask unanimous consent that the papers on the files of the Senate relating to the subject of bankruptcy be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection. There being no objection, it is so ordered.

OFFICERS OF THE SENATE.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business of yesterday, being the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] providing for the election of certain officers of the Senate, the pending question being on the motion of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] to postpone the resolution until the second Monday in December.

Mr. PENDLETON. I ask that the yeas and nays be ordered upon the motion. I called for the yeas and nays yesterday but the debate proceeded before they were ordered.

Mr. DAWES. Does the Senator insist on taking the vote now?

Mr. PENDLETON. No, sir; I only ask that the yeas and nays be ordered.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. McPHERSON. Pending the motion of the Senator from Ohio, I move to amend by making it the first Monday in January, and I ask for the yeas and nays upon that motion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is upon the motion of the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. McPHERSON,] that the consideration of the pending resolution be postponed until the first Monday in January next, upon which he demands the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. FERRY. I suggest to the Senator from New Jersey that he make the time at the opening of the next fiscal year, the first Monday in July.

Mr. PENDLETON. You can do that. That motion would be in order coming from you.

Mr. FERRY. I merely suggest it to the Senator from New Jersey. I presumed it had not occurred to him.

Mr. McPHERSON. The Senator from New Jersey has put his suggestion in the form of a motion.

Mr. HARRIS. I move to indefinitely postpone the pending resolution, and on that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HARRIS. Pending the motion I have just made, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. HARRIS,] that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. HARRIS. At the suggestion of the Senator from Texas, [Mr. COKE,] I withdraw the motion. The Senator from Texas desires to address the Senate.

Mr. COKE Mr. President, I endeavored yesterday evening to obtain the floor, intending to occupy the Senate very briefly in reply to some remarks of the honorable Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] with reference to the State which I have the honor in part to represent upon this floor. It had not been my intention to participate in this debate, nor my desire to do so, and only a duty that I owe to my State causes me now to forego my original intention. The speech of the honorable Senator from Maine was a most remarkable one in many respects, arraigning as it did an entire section of our country and a large portion of its people. It is remarkable for its temper, it is remarkable for its wholesale denunciation, it is remarkable for the recklessness of its statement and for the falsity of its charges. The honorable Senator signalized his advent into this Chamber by an onslaught upon more than one-half in territory and a large proportion of the population of this country in terms of denunciation which if true would prove that those people are not fit associates for civilized people in this enlightened era. I do not envy the Senator who can find it in his heart thus to speak of any portion of the people over whom the flag of this country floats and over whom the laws and the Constitution of this country hold jurisdiction.

It does seem to me that if there is a place in the world where a sovereign State of this Union, where a number of sovereign States of this Union, ought to be able to stand, in the persons of their representation, without being insulted, without being spoken of disrespectfully, without being denounced, it ought to be in the Senate of the United States, the supposed conservative branch of the National Legislature. If not here then I know no sanctuary where they can be protected.

Sir, I am glad that I am so constituted as not to desire to speak ill of any portion of the people of these United States or of any State in this Union. I have no wish to do it; I have no desire to do it. This whole country is my country, and I hope that my mind and my heart are capacious enough to hold all and not be confined to a section. I believe it unwise, I believe it unstatesmanlike, I believe it unjust, I believe it unpatriotic for any Senator upon this floor to arraign any portion of the common constituencies represented here in such terms as the people of one entire section were arraigned by the Senator from Maine on yesterday. I believe that no Senator can truly represent his State and do it. I do not believe that the people of Maine indorse it, nor do I believe that the people of Massachusetts indorse the denunciation of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] uttered so often here in the last three or four weeks against the South. I believe they are more patriotic, have more pride of country, that they are wiser and juster and better than to do it. Other gentlemen may do this. I have no word to allege against any State or against any people in this Union. I have no charge to make against any of them. This is a common country for us all; we are bound indissolubly together, we must stay together, and he who foments strife and stirs sectional feeling and inculcates animosities among those thus bound together cannot, in my judgment, be either a statesman or a patriot.

After having denounced the entire South, after having taunted the South with her poverty, with lawlessness, with fraud, and after having made all manner of charges against that section and that people, the honorable Senator became more specific and singled out four States for his particular denunciation—South Carolina, Mississippi, Texas, and Louisiana. I simply desire to make a reply to the honorable Senator's remarks with reference to the State of Texas. The other States referred to have able representatives on this floor who are amply able to take care of them. The honorable Senator said:

> The Senators from Texas declared that elections in Texas were as peaceable and as honest and as fair as anywhere in this country. Let me give the Senators from Texas a little history of their own State. It is cruel to be obliged to instruct the gentlemen about their own concerns. They seem to have eyes, but they see not; they have ears, but they hear not, unless it be about our peculiar people. I want to call the attention of the Senators from Texas to Harrison County as a specimen brick.

The distinguished gentleman then goes on to take up the vote of Harrison County by election precincts, and at the end of his remarks with reference to each precinct he says:

> No return made. Officers of election indicted and plead guilty to the charge.

The facts with reference to the election in Harrison County are simply these: that the supervising officers of the elections in Harrison County were indicted in the Federal court before Judge Amos Morrill, one of the most rigorous, exacting, and implacable judges I have ever seen in the enforcement especially of the election laws of the United States. They were indicted before Judge Morrill at Jefferson, Texas. They appeared there, pleaded guilty, and were fined $1 each. Why were they fined only $1? Does not the fine, the penalty, usually represent the enormity of the offense? Is it not the aim of the criminal laws to make it so, and of the courts to make it do so? Yet we find Judge Morrill upon a plea of guilty entering a fine of $1 against these parties—it must have been a technical violation of law, because only a nominal fine was imposed.

The gentleman says they were convicted. Yes, they were convicted upon a plea of guilty, and why did they plead guilty? We all know how it is when men are taken from home and carried off to court, and have to lie about waiting for their cases to be reached; we know how irksome it is, we know how expensive it is; we know how men have to sacrifice their business interests at home when they do it. Doubtless these considerations had a great deal to do with their plea of guilty. But take the plea of guilty and the judgment of the court and construe them with the presumption naturally resulting from the statement of facts, and you must conclude (because you must believe that the judge discharged his duty, that is a legal presumption) that the violation of law was a technical one; that the judge saw nothing in it either of turpitude or willfulness or of injury to anybody, else he would not have put the fine so low as one dollar.

Again the Senator from Maine says, in reference to the same county of Harrison:

> On the evening of Sunday, October 31, 1880, two days before the election, one Peter Choice, a colored man, was traveling from Marshall, in Harrison County, Texas, to election and voting precinct numbered 6, a voting place in Harrison County, about seven miles from Marshall, the county seat of Harrison County, to the voting precinct aforesaid, in which he resided. Choice on the day referred to had in his possession a large number, estimated at about three hundred, of republican tickets or ballots, which he had received from the republican executive committee of Harrison County, in Marshall, Texas, for use and distribution on the day of election at the aforesaid voting precinct (which has always given a large republican majority) while he was so traveling, and about a mile and a half outside the corporate limits of Marshall two persons, whom he recognized as one Walter Jennings, a publisher of a newspaper called the Marshall Messenger, and one Wallace Rudd, stopped him on the highway and told him they wanted the tickets he was carrying from him, threatening to kill him if he refused to give the tickets up. Rudd and Jennings were disguised at the time, but pulled the disguises from their faces when they accosted Choice. As Choice refused to give up the tickets in his possession, Rudd and Jennings fired with pistols four times at him, and Choice's life was saved mainly by the fleetness of his horse.

I know one of these men; I know of the other. They were indicted, and while I do not know which of two results did occur, I know that it was one or the other of them, either that they were tried and acquitted or that the district attorney of the United States entered a nolle prosequi. I know one or the other of the two state of facts to exist. They were not convicted either of them; and the honorable Senator does not say they were, and he would have been very certain to have said so if it had occurred. I state the fact to be that they were not, and believe that by order of the court a nolle prosequi was entered.

These men are gentlemen, honest men and good citizens, and I am sustained by the record when I say they were not guilty as charged.

Take these cases from Harrison County as stated by the honorable Senator from Maine himself. Put them upon his own ground; indulge the presumption that will be indulged in any court of justice, that is, that the judge and the district attorney being officers of the law did discharge their duty, and the inevitable conclusion follows that the honorable Senator from Maine has made a false and groundless charge.

Another case mentioned here I know nothing about, the reference to Charles Welsh on the night of November 1, 1880, the day before the election, having had his commission as supervisor of election taken away from him. I know nothing of that; I have never heard of it before. The honorable Senator does not state that the persons who committed this offense were ever indicted or convicted. He makes no statement of that sort, and although I called upon him while making this part of his speech to tell the Senate upon what authority he was making these statements, and he told me that he would, I have failed to find any authority at all for any of them. So far as I have examined the RECORD, and I have examined his speech quite thoroughly, I find that he gives no man, that he gives no record, as his authority; and as it stands before the Senate to-day it stands only upon the word of the honorable Senator from Maine, who I presume never was in Texas.

During the colloquy between the honorable Senator and myself this occurred:

> Mr. COKE. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him? What was the judgment of the court? What was the penalty?
> Mr. FRYE. I do not know, sir.
> Mr. COKE. I can tell the Senator. I think they were fined $1.
> Mr. DAWES. I think that would be about the estimate down there.

The honorable Senator from Massachusetts with an ill-concealed sneer obtruded that remark into the colloquy between the honorable Senator from Maine and myself. Considering that the remark comes from a Senator the laws of whose State would have utterly disfranchised all these republicans, or nine-tenths of them, who are alleged to have been wronged in Harrison County, if they had been in Massachusetts, I think that we "down there," as the honorable Senator styles it, can stand it. Sir, he was a republican judge appointed by General Grant, who held that court. Whatever else may be said of him, his loyalty to the republican party has never been questioned; nor has his zeal in the enforcement of the laws of the United States ever been questioned. He fixed this fine; it was not fixed by a jury.

Again of Harrison County the Senator from Maine said:

> In Harrison County supervisors were denied access to the voting precincts; men supposed to have republican tickets in their possession for distribution fired upon by masked men in broad daylight; prominent republicans wantonly assailed; republican majority of 1,500 changed to a democratic majority of over two thousand; voters intimidated, their lives threatened if they voted for republican candidates; attempts made to kidnap and kill persons carrying republican ballots to polls; republican speakers insulted, assaulted, and their lives threatened; a supervisor of election compelled to surrender his commission by armed men, and to armed men, and then the managers of election refused to recognize him because he had lost his commission.

These are grave charges to make against the people of a county. I know the people of Harrison County very well. They are as good people as can be found in any county North or South. There is as much intelligence, as much patriotism, as much refinement, as much cultivation among them as you will find among any rural people in the world. Their standard of morality is as high as you will find anywhere; and this wholesale charge against them, unverified by a single record, by a single affidavit, by a single statement except the statement of the honorable Senator himself, who knows nothing about them, is false and slanderous. I mean it in no offensive sense to the Senator from Maine, because I know he must make his statement on information; but I brand it here as false from beginning to end. So far as the honorable Senator has produced testimony by referring to the action of the courts I rely upon that testimony to prove its utter falsity. When honorable Senators representing great States rise on this floor and make such statements they should be prepared to sustain them with proof. If they delight in peddling slanders upon the people of a portion of this country, anonymous, unvouched, and unverified slanders, then they must bear the consequences that will attach to those who originated them.

It is claimed by the honorable Senator that there is a republican majority of 1,500 in Harrison County. I deny it. The county court of Harrison County appointed all these election managers and election officers who were indicted as the county courts have to do under the laws of Texas. They are democrats, the honorable Senator from Maine says, and that is true. That county court was elected two years before the election in 1880. How came that court to be democrats if there was a republican majority of 1,500 in Harrison County?

The honorable Senator assumed that the negroes were all republicans. This is very far from being true. There is a large negro population in the county of Harrison, but great numbers of them vote the democratic ticket. The most intelligent and the most influential colored person in Harrison County I am informed stumped the county in every election precinct before the last election in behalf of the democratic ticket, and democratic officials were elected again as they had been at the election preceding.

The honorable Senator says—I remember his language, although I cannot put my finger upon it at this moment—that in Fort Bend County the republican vote was not returned at the last election, and he draws conclusions from that fact that they were fraudulently suppressed, when the truth is that Fort Bend County is one of the few republican counties in Texas. The colored people are largely in the ascendant; they elect all the officers in the county; they are represented in the State senate by a colored republican; they are also represented in the lower house by a republican. The county officers, who appoint the election officers, of course appointed republicans, and if the republican vote was not returned in Fort Bend County it was because republican officials failed or refused to return it. That is all there is about that.

Mr. President, upon this occurrence in the republican county of Fort Bend and upon the allegations of the honorable Senator from Maine with reference to Harrison County, Texas, are based all the charges he has made as far as they concern the State of Texas. Would it be fair or just or right to try the great State of Maine and condemn her people and the people of New England on the irregularities, illegalities and outrages reported in that State during the election when Governor Garcelon was about going out of office? Manifestly not. Yet out of nearly two hundred organized counties he selects Harrison County and Fort Bend County—Harrison County that has gone democratic at two elections in succession, and Fort Bend County, which is strongly republican—he selects these two as evidence to sustain the sweeping charge that because of fraud and intimidation and violence there is not and cannot be "a free ballot and a fair count" in Texas. Sir, I state the fact to be, and I challenge contradiction when I say it, that the sun in heaven does not shine upon a land where, in thought, in utterance, or in action, the people of all classes and conditions and of all colors are freer than they are in Texas, and every allegation to the contrary I stand here to denounce as false and slanderous.

I had heard of the termination of the cases in the Federal court at Jefferson, and by that means of the alleged trouble in Harrison County; but supposed everybody to be satisfied. I sat here in my seat content during this debate, satisfied that my State could not be possibly assailed, and was astonished when the honorable Senator from Maine yesterday selected Texas as one of the principal fields of the fraud, intimidation, and violence he charges to have been practiced throughout the South. I presume he presented his strongest evidence; I imagine so; and if he did, if he brought forward the best evidence, (and he is too good a lawyer not to have done so,) I want nothing better than his own statement to refute every charge he has made.

No, sir, the people of Texas, the white people, the black people, all are in law and in fact free; they are not molested by anybody; and as to the colored people of that State I have to say that a more thrifty, prosperous, contented, and happy laboring people do not live on this earth. They are rapidly acquiring property; they are rapidly educating themselves to the duties of good citizenship; they are rapidly ascending in the scale of moral and intellectual excellence; and the time is not far distant when they will be well represented upon the tax-roll in every county in the State where they are found. They are accumulating; they are surrounding themselves with comforts, providing themselves with homes; their children are being educated; and all this is being done in what the honorable Senators on the other side call the worst Bourbon State in the South; it is being done under democratic administration; and they are growing in excellence in every way under the patronage, the tutelage, the protection, the counsel, and the guidance of their democratic friends.

No, sir; if the gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber desire to attack the democratic party on the ground that it does not permit "a free ballot and a fair count" in the South, they must not come to Texas for their testimony, for they will not find it there. Sir, there are many facts that are pregnant with other facts; there are some conclusions that involve others; and if the honorable Senator from Maine had used evidence very much stronger than any he has brought before the Senate to sustain him, a few plain well-established facts which I shall in a few minutes proceed to state would irrefutably answer him.

Sir, the honorable Senator boasts of the educational facilities of the people of the North and East; he feels a just pride in speaking of them as he has a right to do. He has taunted us of the South with an absence of these facilities, which he had no right to do. We are struggling as no people ever struggled before to march to the front and be abreast with the highest requirement of the times in everything that advances the interests of our people and the greatness of our States. We came out of the civil war poor, very poor. Four millions of slaves who represented every one of them a high money value, inheritable since the foundation of the Government and bought and sold among us as property, were freed. The freeing of the slaves, and so far as we were concerned personally, the destruction of that much value to us individually, was the smallest part of our pecuniary loss. Our lands, dependent as they were upon slave labor for their value, fell to the lowest ebb in the market. They became almost valueless. Debtors for what before the war were insignificant amounts to them were forced into bankruptcy; the lands of the slaveholders passed for the most part, under judgments of foreclosure, out of their possession, and for a mere song, a mere pittance, a mere fraction of their former value. Society, by the turning loose with all the rights of citizenship of four million unlettered, uneducated, immoral blacks, was disorganized, upheaved from its very bottom foundations.

Coming upon the heels of all this, upon a people sunk in the lowest depths of poverty, was the curse of carpet-bag governments forced upon us by the cruel reconstruction laws. These governments taxed and taxed and taxed the people until the pittance they had left was well-nigh exhausted. In this condition, after awhile, with the aid of our good democratic friends in the North and that of liberal republican sentiment which at the same time responded to our appeals for help, we recovered possession of our State governments. We set to work to rebuild, to lay anew the foundations of prosperity, and let the census just taken by an able and conscientious gentleman, a republican, say with what success we have labored. We have astonished the world and ourselves with the results. Throughout the South State debts have either been paid or adjusted to the satisfaction of creditors, or the most strenuous and honorable efforts are being made to adjust and settle them.

What else are we doing? In the interest of humanity, in the interest of good government, in the interest of civilization we are taxing ourselves to our utmost capacity to bear it for the establishment of public free schools, believing that universal education must, if this Government is to be perpetuated, go with universal suffrage. We are educating black and white alike, without distinction; the colored children receiving the same per capita of money raised for school purposes given the white children all over the South. We do not equal Massachusetts in the munificence of our provision for our growing population; we do not equal several other States; but we are doing the very best throughout the South that we can, as the tax-payers in that country know full well. We are doing our part in good faith and to the utmost to raise the colored people and their children to the highest level they can reach, so that they can appreciate the blessings of good government and help us to hand it down to our posterity.

That is something of what we are doing, or rather are trying to do, and I tell you, Senators, we will redeem the South, we will place the South where the genius of her people, her glorious climate and fertile soil, her great mineral, manufacturing, and commercial resources ought to place her. We will make the South the equal in intelligence, in cultivation, in education, in labor, in wealth, in pride, and in aspiration of the North or the East or the West. In building up the South we are helping to build up the greatness of the whole country, of which we are as proud as you can be, and which we claim is ours as much as it is yours.

We do not mean that taunts shall drive us from it. We know our duty and will perform it. We have a great problem before us, the greatest that any people ever had to solve, in an illiterate, recently enfranchised population placed suddenly, without preparation, in full possession of the rights of citizenship and suffrage. We are struggling with the problem. We were chastened and prepared by four years of war and four years of worse than war, of reconstruction, which developed our fortitude, our patience, our philosophy, our strength, and which taught us in those few years the experience of a century. We have had our trials to prepare us for the great problem you have thrust upon us, and we mean to solve it.

You may talk about "a free ballot and a fair count;" the colored people have it; they shall have it. But I tell you that we have the same blood in our veins which courses through yours. We trace ourselves back to conquering races as you do. You know our race; you know that it has never yet been dominated by an inferior race; and I tell you it never will.

The energy, the courage, the fortitude, the skill displayed by the South in behalf of the convictions of that section in the late civil war still survive, but are now turned into peaceful channels; these high qualities are now directed to the building up of the material greatness of the country and to the perpetuation of good government. The southern people know that ignorance and vice and immorality are no safe basis for a stable government; they know that their own race have all the world over governed wherever they have planted their feet, and they mean to govern in the South; they mean to do it constitutionally and lawfully; through their superior virtue, intelligence, capacity, and management they mean to do it; and you may insert forty or forty thousand entering-wedges like that you think you have inserted in Virginia, and it will not abate our purpose or make us deviate from our course, or change the result. We are going to govern that country; we mean to do it lawfully; we mean to do it constitutionally; we mean to do it in the interests of peace, of humanity, of good government, in the interest of a high civilization, in the interest of a glorious and a perpetual Union.

Now, Mr. President, I propose to speak briefly of what we have done in Texas, and ask attention to a few pertinent facts, a statement of which I rely on as a conclusive answer to every insinuation and every charge made by the honorable Senator from Maine on yesterday.

Texas in her declaration of independence recited as one of the grievances against the mother country that no provision had ever been made for public education. In the first constitution framed by the Republic of Texas the foundations were laid broad and deep for a munificent endownent of common free schools, of a university, and of what are known in our statutes as county seminaries. The constitution of 1845, made when Texas was annexed to the United States, improved upon the provisions in this regard of its predecessor. Every constitution under which the people of Texas have ever lived from the first until this time has sedulously guarded the school fund of Texas, provision for which was made in the days of the republic and by its founders; and every public man, every statesman in Texas has regarded it as a part of his highest duty to add from time to time to the security and breadth of these provisions.

As a result of this fundamental legislation we have for our permanent school and university fund lands to the amount of 40,000,000 acres, all of which is common-school fund except about 1,221,400 acres, which is the university fund. This is a permanent fund. Upon the statute-book of Texas there are laws providing for the sale of these lands at prices fixed by appraisers, the proceeds of sale to be invested either in United States bonds or in Texas bonds and the interest only applied annually for public education.

Forty million acres! Texas is being permeated now by railroads in every direction. Many of these lands, already very valuable, are becoming every day very much more so, and they will when sold make a munificent endowment for our common-school system. That is our permanent school fund. Now, what about the annual available school fund for present purposes and present uses? I will tell you.

I should have stated that in addition to the permanent fund in land we have $3,500,000 invested in bonds. The interest on that amount is annually applied to the maintenance of schools. The constitution and laws provide that one-fourth of the general ad valorem State revenue shall be applied annually to common schools. There is a poll-tax of $2 per head, and one-half of that goes to the available school fund annually. Then there are the rentals of school lands, fines for violation of local option laws, &c., &c., and from all these sources combined for the year 1879 (and that is the latest report I have) was realized in cash and applied to the maintenance of public free schools $919,880. That is the annual fund, accruing annually and disbursed annually. Our permanent fund, as the lands are being sold and the proceeds invested, is every day growing, and the annual fund from increased interest is every day growing.

In the same year, to wit, 1879, 138,327 white children and 48,664 colored children received tuition at the public expense for three months, the white children in 4,735 organized schools and the colored children in 1,392 organized schools. The amounts expended in maintaining them was within a few cents of $5 per capita.

Besides, there are two normal schools supported by the State, board and tuition both given to scholars, one for white and the other for colored teachers, and an agricultural and mechanical college, thoroughly appointed and equipped, and in the full tide of successful operation, also maintained by the State.

In the common schools of Texas there were employed according to the report I have just mentioned 3,258 white teachers and 991 colored teachers. The number of white children of scholastic age who did not attend school was 35,111; of colored who did not attend school, 11,854. Why did not these children attend school? Let me tell you why. Take a map of Texas and lay it down on a table before you. Take Maine, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Vermont, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, Delaware, Ohio, and Illinois; put them upon another map close together, and lay them upon the map of Texas that you have before you, and altogether they will lack 6,000 square miles of covering up Texas. All those States that I have named together do not aggregate as many square miles as Texas by 6,000. Now, the population of Texas is greatly scattered in some portions of this vast territory, so that it is utterly impracticable on account of its sparseness to maintain public free schools; but as the settlements expand—and they are moving out rapidly—the public free schools advance pari passu.

Again, sir, having shown you what we are doing for public education, we are taunted in the South, and in Texas especially, with the lawlessness of our people; it is said we are not a law-abiding people; that we are prone to violence, to intimidation, to fraud, and to everything that is bad. Mr. President, I frankly admit that we have always had in Texas, and so far as that is concerned throughout the Southwest and Northwest, more man-killing than we ought to have had. I palliate nothing of that sort, but we have always been surrounded by conditions which have brought about this state of things which have never surrounded any other State or Territory in this Union except it be Arizona or New Mexico. We have vast numbers of people pouring constantly into Texas. The population is heterogeneous, is cosmopolitan, and in pursuing the activities of life restless men, ambitious men, sometimes bad men, come in collision. Until a very few years past our extended line of Mexican and Indian frontier was exposed every day to the forays of Indians and Mexicans, and life and property required for their defense and protection that arms should be constantly worn by the people near the border, and they, like all people who wear arms and are habituated to their use, were too apt to resort to them unjustifiably. This is all changed now; the Texas frontier is amply protected by the Army of the United States and by railroads, and there are but few points along its entire line where there is not perfect security. We now have and have had for years past a most stringent law against carrying concealed weapons, from the operation of which many of the frontier counties were formerly exempted, but this exemption now extends to very few of them.

The population of Texas is rapidly becoming homogeneous, and a public sentiment has grown up, and is very strong, in favor of a vigorous enforcement of the laws; and I assert here, and challenge contradiction from any source, that the public records of Texas for ten years past show the most rigorous, exacting, and sometimes vindictive enforcement of the criminal laws that can be found in any State in this Union.

There has been, according to the report of the attorney-general of Texas, a marked decrease in crime in the last three or four years, although the country has been filling up with population all the time. Out of 2,500 criminal accusations for felony there were 780 convictions—nearly one conviction for every three accusations for the year 1880—and among them nine cases where the sentences were capital were affirmed in our court of last resort. I venture the assertion here that no State in this Union can show a larger proportion of convictions compared with the number of criminal accusations, and that no State in the Union can show half the number of capital sentences affirmed by the highest court in proportion to the number of indictments. There must be a public sentiment in harmony with the criminal laws of a country to enforce them, and that public sentiment exists in Texas, as the facts I have stated show.

But again, sir, if any other evidence were needed I have before me from carefully compiled statistics the number of persons in Texas directly included in the membership of the various religious denominations, and they are 501,000. The population of the State by the recent census is about 1,600,000. These statistics show that nearly one-third of this population are members of Christian churches. I ask the honorable Senator from Maine to ponder over these facts. I point him to our public free schools affording educational privileges to all the children, black and white alike. I point him to the enforcement of our criminal laws with a stringency and a rigor not excelled if equaled elsewhere which could only be brought about by a healthful public sentiment among the masses. I point him to the church membership, to the Christian influences which prevail among those people, and I regret that he did not enable me to accord to him the credit of frankness and generosity, not to say justice and honesty, by making some allusion to them when arraigning them so savagely on such slender grounds.

But this is not all, sir. I have referred to the census as a complete refutation of the slanders against the South, showing as it does the surprising prosperity exhibited among that lately impoverished people, because it is well known that where anarchy and lawlessness prevail and life and property and liberty are insecure, no greater obstructions can exist to material progress.

But with reference to my own State particularly, because I am more familiar with that, I desire to call attention to some other facts. I call attention to the fact that in 1866 there were only three hundred and thirty miles of old, dilapidated, worn-out, rickety railroad in Texas. Now there are 3,600 miles of railroad in good condition operated daily in the limits of the State, and there are nineteen lines in course of rapid construction. Before this year terminates there will be more than 4,000 miles in Texas in operation as against three hundred and thirty miles in 1866.

Capital is flowing into that State from every quarter seeking investment. Does capital, proverbially timid, hunt localities for investment where life and property are insecure? The trains come packed with emigrants from all the States represented by Senators on that side and on this side of the Chamber. They are welcomed there. We give them free schools for their children, we give them homesteads out of our vacant lands, one hundred and sixty acres to each head of a family who will settle upon it, improve it, and live upon it continuously for three years, and eighty acres to each person eighteen years of age not a member of a family. We welcome your people.

Not one of you gentlemen on the other side can go upon any line of railroad and stop at any depot scarcely in Texas but that some one of your old neighbors will step up and greet you. They are down there among us. They say we have a good country; they say our people are good people, hospitable people; they have cast their lots with us. There is scarcely a month in the year that steamers and vessels from European ports do not come into New York or Galveston loaded with emigrants for Texas. Do these facts indicate that life, liberty, or property are insecure there? It seems to me not. It does appear to be a pity that the position of Senators from great and honored States does not have the effect of expanding some gentlemen's minds and hearts to a sufficient capacity to take in at least some of the merits of all portions of our great country.

To give some idea of the increase of commerce, of the renewed and ever-increasing activity of the industries of my State, I will submit a statement of the duties on imported goods collected at the custom-house at Galveston for the year ending December 31, 1880, furnished by order of the collector:

I have here from the National New York Financial Chronicle of the 2d instant a review of the commerce of the leading ports of the country for the month named, conspicuously among which appears that of Galveston. Here it is:

The following table gives the value of domestic and foreign exports from United States ports for the month of February in 1880 and 1881:

Ports.	1880.	1881.
New York	$23,785,251	$28,032,342
New Orleans	9,780,037	11,121,124
Baltimore	4,490,388	4,901,389
Boston	4,730,261	5,659,964
Philadelphia	2,336,869	2,556,283
San Francisco	2,687,504	3,445,741
All other ports	12,146,363	11,934,007
Total	59,956,673	67,650,850

The subjoined table gives the value of exports of merchandise at leading cotton ports for the month of February in 1880 and 1881:

Ports.	1880.	1881.
Charleston	$1,525,527	$1,821,030
Galveston	1,383,004	2,569,717
Mobile	1,313,279	797,112
Norfolk	1,628,254	1,122,920
Savannah	2,668,561	2,271,990
Wilmington	417,138	379,075
Total	8,935,763	9,061,848

The aggregate of the cotton ports, notwithstanding the lower price of the staple this year than last, is rightly higher than in 1880. "It will be noticed from the table," says the Chronicle, "that while the aggregate of the six ports varies little in the two years, there is quite a marked difference in the case of the separate ports. Mobile, Norfolk, Savannah, and Wilmington had smaller totals this year, but the loss at these points was more than made good by the heavy gain at Charleston and Galveston. At the latter port the value of the exports was almost double that of last year, that port being conspicuous, as in the previous months, for its large increase. Examining the cotton figures we find that, with the exception of Wilmington, the four ports first mentioned all had smaller cotton exports, while Charleston and Galveston had larger exports."

While the first table submitted gives an idea of the imports, this shows the exports from the port of Galveston alone. In a country prosperous like this, increasing every day its wealth, its population, its influence, with every element of its greatness expanding and developing with almost magical rapidity, can it be possible that this is a country in which life and liberty and property are insecure, as charged by the honorable Senator from Maine? Meaning no offense to that honorable Senator, for personally I esteem him, I do say that these great salient facts give the lie direct to every statement made in his speech of yesterday derogatory to Texas.

But, sir, this is not all. We have heard a great deal here about repudiation, about different States repudiating their debts. No man charges Texas with repudiation. Her revolutionary debt was paid to the satisfaction of her creditors, while the revolutionary debt of the United States was never paid. Her reconstruction debt is funded into bonds that you will not find quoted in the New York papers or in the stock market, because they were bought for investment and one hundred and twenty cents on the dollar will not touch one of them. There has never been for a day or an hour a dollar of her interest in arrear since 1874, when her first democratic governor was inaugurated. Her bonds are in the vaults of the best and strongest financial men in New York, laid safely away and taken out semi-annually only to cut off the coupons and receive the interest, because they are 5, 6, and 7 per cent. bonds and the holders can get nothing to suit them so well. Hence it is that you never see one quoted in the market report in New York. Does such credit as this indicate that we are a lawless, law and God defying people, given over to fraud, intimidation, to ignorance and to illiteracy?

Last year, that is the year before the last crop year, the cotton crop of Texas was 1,000,000 bales. This year just past it is estimated at something near a million and a quarter of bales. Our next interest, and one in which we largely outstrip any other State, is our cattle interest. We receive more money for our cattle annually than any other State in the Union. Texas is the second wool-producing State in the Union, and she is the first in cotton, as the reports show. Illinois alone owns more horses than Texas; California alone more sheep. In 1870 our population was a scant 850,000 or 875,000; now it is nearly double; our taxable values are quadrupled. Our common schools are sharing our prosperity and are diffusing their benefits throughout our whole population. Our laws are being executed rigorously. Everything in the history of Texas, as testified to by the public prints, by eminent capitalists who have traveled through the country, by divines, by the friends of those who emigrate there—the universal testimony is that every element of prosperity is there; that school-houses and churches are there; that law-abiding and law-loving public sentiment is there; efficient, honest, economical government is there; that everything is on the up-grade and improving and giving the best possible promise of future excellence and future advancement. This is one of the States which, forsooth, the honorable Senator from Maine characterizes in substance as a bulldozing, lawless, violent, fraudulent, barbarous State. I appeal to the judgment of the people of this great country, North, East, and West, to decide between that Senator and myself and say whether he has not slandered an honest, a gallant, a generous, an intelligent, and a progressive people.

Sir, Texas has a history of her own, of which her people are proud. She came not into this Union a mendicant. She came rich in her public domain and richer yet in traditions and in history. She came with a line of civic and military heroes to point to as her contribution to the galaxy of eminent men produced in this country whose lives had been devoted to the public service and to the amelioration of the condition of mankind. A handful of adventurous spirits were found in that country under the leadership of Stephen F. Austin, and I am proud to say that some of the truest and most heroic of that little band were from Connecticut and from Maine. Mexican despotism commenced its operations upon them. They had nothing. They were clothed in buckskin. They had their trusty rifles and their bowie-knives, and nothing else except brave hearts and strong arms. This handful of brave men under the lead of Austin and Houston and their great colleagues in council and on the field after an arduous struggle achieved the independence of Texas against all the power of Mexico directed by Santa Anna who proudly styled himself the Napoleon of the West. From the bloody field of San Jacinto the single star of Texas rose above the horizon the emblem of a new republic about taking her place among the nations of the earth.

In the vestibule of the State-house at Austin, the beautiful capital of Texas, may be seen a monument of stone upon a plain pedestal, upon which is engraved the names of the heroes who fell at the Alamo, and this inscription upon one of its panels: "Thermopylæ had her messenger of defeat, the Alamo had none." Sir, not a man survived that massacre. There it was that Crockett and Bowie and Travis and their compatriots fell and poured out the blood which gave baptism to the infant republic. Planted in that soil was the seed which germinated and matured in Texan independence, for the battle-cry at San Jacinto was: "Remember the Alamo!" In the civil war Texas cast her lot with her sisters of the South, and her sons died upon every battle-field from Arizona to Gettysburgh where the contending armies met. Since the return of peace, turning her back upon the past she has looked only to the future, and, as results attest, has been no laggard in the march of improvement. She is sincerely attached to this Government and its flag, as she will prove whenever any sacrifice, whatever it may be of blood or treasure, is demanded of her in defense of its rights or honor. She is proud of its greatness and rejoices in its strength, and will allow none of her sisters to outstrip her in earnestness or steadiness of effort to add to its wealth and its glory.

Sir, I have but little more to say, having already trespassed upon the time of the Senate greatly longer than I intended, but I wish for a moment to advert to the avowed intention of the republican party as represented in the Senate through the pending measure as a commencement to break up the solid South; in other words, to disintegrate the democratic party by an alliance with the ignorance, illiteracy, and communism of that section. It is an admitted fact that when the republican party had possession of the State governments of the South they were the most corrupt, most extravagant, and most oppressive governments in the world. They bankrupted the States with debt while taxing the people to their utmost and even beyond their ability to pay. They obstructed all improvement, all advancement, and stagnated all public and private enterprise. These republican governments were overthrown by the people at the polls. They were succeeded by democratic governments, and the change for the better was immediate and marvelous. From the very depths of poverty and despondency the States of the South under democratic rule have become, considering all the circumstances, as the census will show, the most prosperous in the Union. Why, then, must the democratic party be broken down in the South? The material, moral, and industrial interests of those States certainly do not demand a restoration of republican rule there. Mr. President, the country understands why the public business is obstructed and this unseemly struggle is prolonged. It is without reference to the interests of the country, done to gain power for the republican party.

In the South we have felt the sort of political power you desire to restore there. We felt it in the days of reconstruction; and I tell you that as long as by objurgation, by denunciation, by slanders and false charges you keep us under the impression that you will again place us under the same character of governments when in your power, we will stand shoulder to shoulder in a solidity which cannot be broken.

Our people are organized like yours. They differ about banks and tariff and internal improvements; they differ on questions of administration, of expediency, of policy, and of constitutionality, just as your people do; but you will not allow them to express their differences. When you close up your ranks and commence war upon them they sink their differences of opinion on everything, and, remembering a common ruin, stand together to avert a calamity which your temper, your language, your conduct indicates will be inflicted upon them if you should ever succeed in breaking their solidity. You compel us in defense of ourselves, our civilization, and our property to this course. We have no other alternative. If you would break political solidity in the South you must let us alone; you must respect the Constitution, which leaves each State to regulate its own internal affairs free from outside interference; which leaves the intellectual, moral, and industrial forces of each State to work out the destiny of its people; or which, in other words, reserves to each State the right of local self-government. Let us alone, and our people will divide politically as other people do.

Edmunds,	Kellogg,	Sewell,

So the Senate refused to proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] to indefinitely postpone the resolution.

Mr. DAWES. The Senate having by a decided majority determined that they will not do other business except the pending business, I hope I may not appeal in vain to the Senator from Tennessee and those acting with him to let us take a vote now upon the resolution.

Mr. HARRIS. Being so anxious as I am, and as I know the Senator from Massachusetts is, to get on with the public business, and as we have accomplished so much by energetic application and effort for the last four weeks, I believe I shall detain the Senate long enough to ask it to order now that when it shall adjourn to-day it be to meet at nine o'clock to-morrow, so that we can get here early and do a big day's work in disposing of the public business. I make that motion, Mr. President.

Mr. DAWES. I have no objection to meeting at nine o'clock to-morrow if the Senator from Tennessee will give any earnest assurance that when he comes here at nine o'clock to-morrow he will address himself to the pending business.

Mr. HARRIS. I assure the Senator from Massachusetts that when I come here to-morrow I shall appeal to the Senator from Massachusetts, as I have appealed to him day by day and every day for a month, to address himself to that public business for which this session of the Senate was convened, to address himself to the consideration of about two hundred nominations that lie upon the table to fill vacancies in public offices, in respect to which the public interest is day by day and hour by hour suffering because those vacancies are not filled—vacancies in offices vastly more important than to displace a very efficient Secretary of the Senate and a very efficient Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate, both of whom are performing their duties in a manner satisfactory even to the exacting disposition of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. DAWES. The difficulty with the Senator from Tennessee is that he differs with the Senate. The Senate has determined what the pending business is, and the Senate disagrees with the Senator from Tennessee; and yet he is not happy. What can we do for a Senator who throws himself constantly across the path of the Senate? Shall the Senate disband for the accommodation of the Senator from Tennessee? I would disband anything but the Government to accommodate the Senator from Tennessee; but I hold an allegiance higher even than my personal regard for the Senator from Tennessee. I do not know of anything I would not do, except forego my duty to the Government, to accommodate the Senator from Tennessee. My constant regret is that the Senator from Tennessee cannot see his duty to be consistent with the demand of the Senate itself. Why cannot the Senator open his eyes and see that he is casting himself upon the thick bosses of constitutional authority?

Mr. CONKLING. I understand the Senator from Tennessee to move that when the Senate adjourn it be to meet at nine o'clock in the morning?

Mr. HARRIS. That is my motion.

Mr. CONKLING. That presents the first opportunity I have seen for a compromise; and, speaking to these younger and more enthusiastic men, I venture to make a suggestion. The Senator from Tennessee wants to carry his motion. I suggest to him that if he will vary it a little in time, and make the hour twelve o'clock, we shall all vote for it, and that will produce that unanimity in the Senate which has not been found upon other motions; but if the Senator struggles for nine o'clock that would divide the Senate, as many wish to come here at twelve. We can all vote that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet at twelve o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. HARRIS. I should be glad to accommodate the views of the Senator from New York, but that would lose us three hours, and three hours of such work as we are doing must be of great importance. Anxious as I am to accommodate the Senator, I cannot accept his proposition.

Mr. CONKLING. If the honorable Senator from Tennessee says, and means it, that if we adjourn to meet at twelve o'clock we should lose hours of his society and that of other gentlemen, I withdraw the suggestion. I shrink, as he does, from such a denial as that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. HARRIS,] that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet at nine o'clock to-morrow morning. [Putting the question.] The ayes seem to have it.

Mr. DAWES. I ask for a division.

There were on a division ayes 20, noes 21.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is lost. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] to indefinitely postpone the pending resolution, on which motion the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator from Tennessee shows how confused he is as to his duty. He moves to indefinitely postpone the pending business and yet a moment ago he was struggling to proceed with it.

Mr. CONKLING. Will he not withdraw that motion now?

Mr. DAWES. The Senator from New York appeals to the Senator from Tennessee to withdraw the motion and proceed to business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion cannot be withdrawn except by unanimous consent.

Mr. HARRIS. As the yeas and nays been ordered it would require unanimous consent, and I cannot consent to appeal to the Senate to allow me to do so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the withdrawal of the motion of the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. COCKRELL. I object.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator withdraw the motion for the purpose of debate?

Mr. HARRIS. I must decline to oblige the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. FARLEY. I am about to make a suggestion to the Senate that I think it would be a good thing to adopt. There is, as is reported, a very large number of appointments lying on the Secretary's desk that have not been referred to committees for consideration. I can see no objection on that side of the Chamber to going into executive session and having the proper reference made of the nominations that have been sent to the Senate by the President for consideration. If Senators wish to continue this contest over the election of officers after they have got through with referring the nominations, they may renew the question of which the Senator from Massachusetts is champion on the floor of the Senate. After the nominations are referred to the respective committees to whom they ought properly to be referred, if those gentlemen who are in favor of discussing the various conflicts in the several States as to their status wish to go on with that matter, it will give the committees an opportunity to consider those appointments; and then you can still go on with the proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts as to the election of officers. I therefore move that the Senate do now proceed to the consideration of executive business, upon which motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I wish to say, Mr. President, before the vote is taken on the motion of the Senator from California, that I desire to submit a few observations to the Senate upon a portion of the speech delivered by the Senator from Maine yesterday in relation to my State I say now, in all honesty and earnestness, that I had no disposition whatever to take any part in this debate; but after what was said yesterday by the Senator from Maine, I feel that I ought to say a few words. They will be short and pointed; but inasmuch as I have seen in the public press that he intended to absent himself on Saturday from his duties in this Chamber, I desire now to say that I do not wish to speak in his absence.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The call will be proceeded with on the motion of the Senator from California, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BURNSIDE, (when Mr. ANTHONY'S name was called.) My colleague [Mr. ANTHONY] is paired with the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. HILL.] If my colleague were here, he would vote "nay."

Mr. CAMDEN, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. SAWYER.] I make this announcement for the day.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. BUTLER.]

Mr. BROWN, (when the name of Mr. HILL, of Georgia, was called.) My colleague [Mr. HILL] is still absent from the city and is still paired with the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. ANTHONY.]

Mr. JONES, of Florida, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. ROLLINS.] If he were here, I should vote "yea."

Mr. MCPHERSON, (when his name was called.) I am paired with my colleague, [Mr. SEWELL.]

Mr. MILLER, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DAVIS.]

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. SLATER. I announce that my colleague [Mr. GROVER] is paired with the Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. VAN WYCK.]

Mr. FARLEY. I wish to announce that the Senator from Nevada [Mr. FAIR] is paired with his colleague, [Mr. JONES.]

Mr. COCKRELL. I desire now to announce for some days to come that I shall be here in my seat every time a vote is cast, but I shall not vote because I am paired with the Senator from Maine, [Mr. FRYE,] who is called home on business. I will always vote the other way from the way in which he would vote.

The result was announced—yeas 22, nays 22; as follows:

YEAS—22.

Bayard,	George,	Johnston,	Ransom,
Beck,	Gorman,	Jonas,	Saulsbury,
Brown,	Groome,	Lamar,	Slater,

So the Senate refused to proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, I move that when the Senate adjourn to-day, it adjourn to meet on Monday morning at twelve o'clock, and on that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. DAWES. Is that motion debatable?

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I do not think it is.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is debatable by unanimous consent.

Mr. DAWES. I desire to say to the Senate that I trust, with the pressure of public business upon us here and in view of all the circumstances that surround this session of the Senate, the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania will not prevail. I regret to be compelled to enter my protest, for one, against the adjourning of the Senate from to-day until twelve o'clock on Monday. Monday is a day which we shall be obliged to adjourn over on account of ceremonies that it is very proper for us to pay some attention to; and to adjourn from Thursday to Monday and then from Monday immediately to Tuesday without the transaction of any important business is a publication to the world that I for one do not desire to make. I am here, sir, in earnest to discharge the work before the Senate; I am here in good faith believing that the action of this Senate upon the pending resolution is of importance to the country; or I would not be here at all. I am myself, for one—and I doubt not all the rest of the Senate are of the same opinion—of the belief that I am acting in the discharge of a duty that no other considerations except absolute necessity will justify me in avoiding. And while I regret to oppose the Senator from Pennsylvania in this motion, I do think that the public service requires that we should forget everything else and devote ourselves to an honest and an earnest effort to accomplish the work which has kept us here now nearly two months; and I hope that no longer delay will be brought upon the consideration of business than that which is absolutely necessary. For one, sir, I am willing to stand here at my post without adjournment until that shall be accomplished.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. May I interrupt the Senator for a moment? Were you willing to stand here a week ago at your post? Was not an adjournment made because you requested it?

Mr. DAWES. I am astonished at the question.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. The Senator need not be astonished.

Mr. DAWES. I am, I say it most respectfully. I did not know that fact before.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. It came to me from yourself.

Mr. DAWES. Two weeks ago it became somewhat necessary for me to go to the city of New York——

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. Ah! now we are getting it!

Mr. DAWES. I hope the Senator will wait. I found a disposition to work; I procured a man to go to New York for me, and then after that the Senate did adjourn over. If the Senate adjourned over for any other reason than because they wanted to do so, it is news to me. I say that feeling it my duty to stand to my post, I procured the service of a man to go to New York on business that it was necessary for me or some other person to go about; and the only reason he did not go and leave me here at my post was because the Senate, not on my motion, adjourned over.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. But upon my motion at your request, I think. [Laughter.]

Mr. DAWES. Well, now, Mr. President, the Senator is mistaken. It was not on the Senator's motion at all. I will not have any differences with the Senator. Of course the Senate——

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. On your motion, if you will permit me to say.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair reminds Senators that they must address the Chair.

Mr. DAWES. I am on the floor. Of course the Senate will adjourn over if there is a majority of them who desire to do so. I apprehend the Senate will bow to the will of the majority if it is for an adjournment over, whatever may be their scruple when the question of proceeding to the legitimate business is up. I never knew the Senate resist the will of the majority on a motion to adjourn over. I enter my protest against an abandonment by this Senate of the pending business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania moves——

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I now enter my desire, my request for myself and for many Senators in this body, that the Senate adjourn until Monday next, and I make the motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania moves that the Senate adjourn. Does the Senator move that the Senate do now adjourn until Monday?

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I think we had better do that. I make the motion in that form.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania moves that the Senate do now adjourn until Monday at twelve o'clock, on which motion the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

Other SENATORS. Debate is out of order.

Mr. FARLEY. The motion has been debated for half an hour.

Several SENATORS. By unanimous consent.

Mr. FARLEY. The motion was made by the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. It is not debatable.

Mr. FARLEY. I am inclined to the opinion now that if that motion is voted down the honorable Senator from Massachusetts will be willing to let us proceed to the consideration of the business before the Senate.

Mr. DAWES. I will most certainly.

Mr. FARLEY. And we shall then go into executive session.

Mr. DAWES. Just as soon as that business is disposed of.

Mr. FARLEY. Oh, well, that is the business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll on the motion to adjourn until Monday at twelve o'clock.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, (when his name was called.) On this motion I think the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] would vote "yea;" but not knowing certainly what he would do, having been paired with him on all questions of a political nature, I shall withhold my vote, for the present at least.

Mr. JONES, of Florida, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. ROLLINS.] I do not know how he would vote, but if he were here, I should vote "yea."

Mr. MILLER, (when his name was called.) I am paired as before stated.

Mr. PLUMB, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. VEST.] If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. WALKER, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Colorado, [Mr. HILL.]

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. ALLISON. On these questions I am paired with the Senator from West Virginia, [Mr. DAVIS.] I do not know how he would vote on this motion; but if he were here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I am told by the friends of the gentleman with whom I am paired that, if he were here, he would vote in the same direction as myself; therefore I shall vote "yea."

Mr. GROOME. Having understood the Senator from Massachusetts to say in substance that he would consider that if this vote prevailed it was an instruction to abandon the policy that his side had been pursuing, I vote "yea."

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I beg your pardon; then I shall withdraw my vote.

Mr. GROOME. I did not say "the Senator from Pennsylvania."

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I do not care; you said "this side." I withdraw my vote.

Mr. BLAIR, (after having voted in the affirmative.) I reverse my vote, and vote "nay."

Mr. BURNSIDE, (after having voted in the affirmative.) I change my vote; I wish to vote "nay."

Mr. HAWLEY, (after having voted in the affirmative.) I change my vote to "nay."

Mr. HARRIS, (after having voted in the affirmative.) As the mover has withdrawn his vote I believe I will change mine and vote "nay," as the gentleman who made the motion has retired from it.

Mr. CALL, (after having voted in the affirmative.) I change my vote to "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 17, nays 25; as follows:

YEAS—17.

Brown,	Groome,	McDill,	Slater,
Conkling,	Jackson,	Morgan,	Voorhees.

So the motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] to indefinitely postpone the resolution.

Mr. CALL and Mr. FARLEY addressed the Chair.

Mr. CALL. I will yield for a moment.

Mr. FARLEY. I was about to make a motion to proceed to the consideration of executive business. I think this is a good time to do it. There seems to be a little disturbance in the happy family.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. To that I shall object. There is no disturbance whatever; there was never a happier family in the world.

Mr. FARLEY. I make the motion unless the Senator from Florida desires to speak now. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. To that I object.

Mr. CALL. I yield for the motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from California, [Mr. FARLEY.] [Putting the question.] The ayes seem to have it.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BURNSIDE, (when Mr. ANTHONY's name was called.) My colleague [Mr. ANTHONY] is paired with the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. HILL.] If my colleague were here, he would vote "nay."

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. BUTLER.]

Mr. MCPHERSON, (when his name was called.) I wish to announce finally and for the day that I am paired with my colleague, [Mr. SEWELL.]

Mr. MILLER, (when his name was called.) I announce for the day that I am paired with the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DAVIS,] and also that the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. KELLOGG] is paired with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE] for the day.

The result was announced—yeas 22, nays 22; as follows:

So the motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the motion to postpone the resolution indefinitely.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I desire to make some remarks upon the speech of the honorable Senator from Maine, [Mr. FRYE.] The honorable Senator evidently was under the impression inasmuch as there is such a thing as a poetic license that the same would hold true in regard to oratory, and in the course of his oratorical license he made the following remarks:

> The Senator from Florida also had the courage to call the laboring men of the North, especially of New England, "serfs," "hungry, starving employés of our mills, working out a weary existence under the cruel hand of the hard-hearted task-master."

The honorable Senator from Maine has this expression in quotation marks. I wish to say that I have never used such an expression; that it is not to be found in my speech; that I never had such an idea, and I cannot conceive where the honorable Senator from Maine obtained this expression, especially putting it in quotation marks. I hope that he will correct this statement, because there is no foundation for it; he has no right to make such a statement. Such words were never used, and are not to be found in the RECORD, nor was there any sentiment of that description. But that is quite as true as anything else that the Senator said, for in a speech of more than an hour's length——

Mr. DAWES. I do not know that any Senator has put on record what ought to be stated, that these replies to the Senator from Maine are made in his necessary absence from the Senate.

Mr. CALL. I am very sorry. I shall not say anything personally disrespectful to the Senator from Maine; but inasmuch as his speech is going out to the country and as there is in quotation marks an observation ascribed to me which I never made either in the terms or in the spirit, in which I do not concur but in all that I said expressed the contrary opinion, I wish the statement to be made that it may appear here now.

But, Mr. President, I desire to say that in the extraordinary speech, as it has been well characterized, of the Senator from Maine there is quite as much truth in everything else that he said as there is in this remark. The honorable Senator in the first place seems to be entirely unfamiliar with that Bible which is the foundation of New England civilization. He puts Massachusetts, the ancient and great Commonwealth of Massachusetts, in the place of the Philistine, Goliath, and he even takes the liberty of moving the Divine Being from the protection of David and assigns him to the Philistine, Goliath.

So in regard to the statements in reference to my own State of Florida, the alleged outrages there, the honorable Senator used the following language:

> The Senator from Florida declared that that State above all others was perfectly peaceable, perfectly free, every man had a right to vote, and vote as he pleased, and his vote was counted just as he cast it, and when he was saying it the cry came here from the other House in the case of Bisbee vs. Hull, "Testimony cannot be taken because murder stalks abroad and witnesses dare not testify."

Mr. President, these calumnies ought to cease. Senators ought not to state, they are not justified by public opinion and by right in stating, charges of this description unless they have some respectable evidence on which to base them. The fact in this case is that in the county of Madison a democrat, a quiet, peaceable, God-fearing man, as good a man as is to be found in any community, a white man, named Patterson, was murdered and foully murdered, the officers of the Government of the United States being to blame, they being republicans; he alone, the only white man except two or three republicans and the only democrat present, was murdered by a colored republican without offense and without provocation, except that in a heated and angry controversy he struck the colored man with his open hand. That is a specimen of these statements. I state here in the Senate (and I say to the Senator from Maine that he cannot contradict the statement) that the charge which he has made against the people of Florida of murder to keep witnesses from testifying rests upon the fact that a democrat, a peaceable, God-fearing young man, one of two children who were the only support of a pious old Scotch widow, was murdered in a crowd of colored people. The deputy collector of internal revenue of the United States, abandoning his proper functions in the town of Jacksonville, went as a notary public under the State law to the town of Madison to take the evidence in the contested case of Bisbee vs. Finley—not Bisbee vs. Hull. He knew that he had been a strong party man, and that the people of that county believed that he had committed great wrongs upon them, and that they would believe that his object was to procure testimony which was not true. He abandoned his office and his duties as deputy collector of internal revenue in the district of Florida, at Jacksonville, and went to the town of Madison, and there in the room where they were taking the testimony, with none but colored people and republicans present, this young man observed to a colored witness who had testified the day before, "You have testified to that which was false in regard to me;" the colored man replied with angry and menacing and violent words, and young Patterson then struck the man in the face with his open hand. The colored man seized him in the presence, in the hearing of these men, within a few steps from them, and it is charged that they could by moving from their seats have arrested the colored man before the commission of the crime, and the colored man shot young Patterson through the heart, and he fell dead then and there.

I mention that as one of the cases. The other case which was alleged was that of an obstruction of the process of the United States court by the arrest by certain persons in disguise of the officer and the persons whom he had arrested occurring soon after the congressional election of last fall. There is no authority for the statement as made by the Senator from Maine. The facts are these: Some white men, democrats, were arrested by a deputy marshal at Madison under circumstances that were evidently not a proper foundation for a warrant. They obeyed the writ; there was no difficulty in the arrest. While upon the cars and a few miles from the place of arrest the train was stopped at a way station, and some men got aboard in disguise, and they released these prisoners and forced them off. The prisoners were respectable men. They immediately telegraphed to the marshal in Jacksonville that they had been forcibly taken from the officers by persons whom they did not know, and that they had no knowledge of the object of the persons who came on the train and forced them off; did not believe that it was by any procurement of any friend of theirs; they believed that it was a trick of persons wishing to injure them, and they reported the next day to the district court at Jacksonville and proceeded to give bond; and the supposition is that this was one of those miserable frauds that are perpetrated for the purpose of deceiving the people of the country and being stated here. But the parties who were released from their arrest refused to accept that release, they proceeded to Jacksonville, submitted to the precept of the court, gave the bond, and are in court for their trial on the charge stated in the original warrant of arrest.

As to the rest of the statement of the danger to trains running there is nothing in it. The trains were run by a receiver of the United States court; and if there be any danger there, I have never heard of it, and I know that it is not true.

It is certainly true that in the county of Madison when this murder occurred and these parties were arrrested, this republican, this deputy collector of internal revenue who abandoned his duty and his place in order to go as a notary public of the State and take testimony in a district in which he knew the people were greatly prejudiced against him because of alleged improper transactions—it is certainly true that when the murderer was arrested an angry mob sought to release him; but it was not a democratic mob, it was a mob of people that were of the colored race, incited by the republicans. I put that on record.

The number of the colored people who gathered together with arms for the forcible release of the colored murderer, who was confined in jail in the town of Madison, is estimated to have been several hundred, perhaps a thousand men. They camped in the little village for one or two days and nights, and the disturbance was so serious that the governor ordered out the military from adjoining counties and law and order was peaceably maintained without injury to any one.

Mr. President, these are the only charges that are specified against the State of Florida. I have disposed of them. If the Senator from Maine can find any testimony of any respectable man who will testify to the contrary of these allegations of mine, I pledge myself to produce the oaths of ten respectable men, democrats and republicans, sustaining every statement that I have made in regard to these facts.

Now, Mr. President, I would desire to ask, if the honorable Senator were here, whether he thinks it is worthy of this presence and worthy of this country for him to put forth an argument in regard to the relative amount of taxes paid by the people of Florida and the people of Massachusetts and of Rhode Island to education upon a basis of so much per capita. The Senator affirms in that comparison that the basis of taxation should be numbers and not property; that the people should be taxed by the head and not by the amount of wealth, of property, of production that they have. He goes on to say:

> But the Senator from Florida charges upon Massachusetts and Rhode Island and Connecticut that they deprive people of the ballot. How deprive people of the ballot? Why, he has the boldness to say that they do require men to be able to read their ballots. It took courage to make that declaration on the part of the Senator, for he did it in the face and eyes of the fact that Massachusetts to-day raises for her schools $5,000,000 a year, opens school-house doors in every hamlet in that great Commonwealth, and then enacts laws to compel parents to send their children to school, while the State of Florida raises but $134,000 a year for the same purpose. The Commonwealth of Massachusetts which put that limitation of education upon her voters raised $16 a head for children between five and fifteen years of age, while the State of Florida only raises fifty cents per capita; and the Senator from Georgia was bold enough when he made the same attack if he remembered that Georgia raised but sixty cents for white and but fifteen cents for black scholars.
> I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Florida to a little comparison between his State and Rhode Island, for he had the bravery to attack Rhode Island, too.
> I have here some comparative school statistics of Florida and Rhode Island for the years 1877 and 1878, taken from the reports of the Commissioner of Education. Rhode Island, 41,000 pupils; Florida, 36,000—very little difference in the number of pupils. Teachers employed in Rhode Island, 1,312; in Florida, 970. School property in Rhode Island, $2,634,000; Florida, $116,000. Whole receipts for public schools in Rhode Island, $709,444; in Florida, $123,311. Whole amount expended in Rhode Island, $679,771; in Florida, $134,880. Per capita expenditure in Rhode Island, $11.54; in Florida, $3.64.

That argument is not becoming to this presence or to this country. The State of Florida contributes as much in proportion to her wealth, in proportion to her property, as Massachusetts or Rhode Island. Massachusetts has over two thousand million dollars' worth of property; the State of Florida, by the census of 1870, only thirty millions, probably at this time forty-odd millions. The State of Rhode Island has largely over two hundred millions of property, the State of Florida only thirty millions. By a proper estimate Senators will easily see that Florida, with her sparse population, with her unimproved lands, with her vast non-tax-paying territory, with her small production, contributes as largely to public education, even of the colored people, and for whom the Senator from Maine, although he lives far away from them and has no concern for them except when he wants a subject for fiery oratory, wishes to constitute himself the guardian. For this purpose the white population of Florida, largely in the majority, have imposed a tax which is collected and paid and appropriated honestly, as the returns show, as large in proportion to the wealth of the State as either Massachusetts or Rhode Island with their uninterrupted industries and their great productions and their prosperous manufactories and their great corporations. Florida, with her widely scattered population, without manufactories, pays as liberally in proportion to her property as Massachusetts.

Mr. President, this is not the place for idle and vague and untruthful assertion of facts. We should be above deceiving the country even if we could do so by assertions which have no foundation either in the facts reported in the census or in the laws or in any other ascertained and authentic or probable source of information.

I wish to ask the honorable Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] who I see in his seat, what he meant by a statement he made on the 11th of April which I have had in my mind to call his attention to for some time, as follows:

> The charge and the complaint is that in certain States men qualified by the State laws and the Constitution of the United States are deprived of the franchise, some of them by violence, some of them by artifice, some of them by being snowed under, as I described it, by dishonest and irresponsible pieces of paper, and some of them by forged returns, a most remarkable instance of which existing in the State the Senator himself represents on this floor.

The honorable Senator from Massachusetts made that statement, and I should like to know what he means and what his authority for it is, if the Senator will be kind enough to state.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, I alluded to what I supposed was a part of the history of the judiciary of the country in certain trials in the State of Florida touching the validity of papers there that purported to be returns of elections. The Senator, I think, knows to what I allude. There have been in the last two years some very remarkable papers filed as election returns, about the authenticity of which there was a question, so that some grand jury found bills of indictment against certain distinguished gentlemen, and certain gentlemen were tried, and how near they came to being convicted the Senator knows as well as I do.

Mr. CALL. I really did not know what the Senator alluded to until he made this remark. I do now. We have had in the State of Florida two cases in which there have been alleged to be forged returns. In one of them only has there been a trial in the United States court. I recognize that one by that remark. The first forged return we had—and I really did not know but that the Senator was referring to that—the first forged return we had was the return by which Mr. Hayes was made President of the United States, which rested upon the sworn statement of republicans in good fellowship with the party, a Mr. Dennis, of the county of Alachua, who produced the stolen returns and swore with his companions to the facts which beyond denial evidenced the forgery of the false return by which the late President of the United States obtained his seat, and the return from box No. 2 at Archer, in the county of Alachua, in Florida, was the subject of that forgery and that return.

The statement to which the Senator now alludes is not worthy of being made the ground of an accusation against our people, because the great fraud, the great forgery, was the forgery in Alachua County which the honorable gentleman sustained, by which the vote of Florida in the electoral college was destroyed and given for another candidate and a different person from the one receiving the vote of the people of that State. That is proved beyond a doubt, beyond a question. I meet the case to which the Senator refers, because I have before said that gentlemen could not make a charge of any kind against the State of Florida in the last four years of its administration which impeached the integrity of the administration of the State law or the clemency and good fellowship and sympathy of the races, which impeached the honor of just, impartial, and honest administration, which in any way denied the liberal contribution of taxes to an efficient system of public instruction. They cannot make these statements and sustain them in the light of facts. Therefore I give attention to the circumstance referred to by the Senator from Massachusetts, and I will at all times be ready to discuss it and all its attendant facts and bring proof to sustain the statements which I make. I invite attention, investigation, scrutiny, and proof of any and all charges against the people or State of Florida.

In the county of Brevard, in one of the congressional districts of Florida, a small county casting less than two hundred votes, there was a conspiracy alleged to have been gotten up, and no doubt it was gotten up, in the congressional election. The county was too small a county for any antecedent probability that its vote would affect the vote of the district at large; but taking advantage of the closeness of the vote and of the decision of the courts by which the Alachua County fraud in the canvass of the votes of Alachua County was sustained, a democratic lawyer, as he subsequently stated as State's evidence, alleging that he was moved to it by a telegram sent to another person by Mr. Hull, then the democratic candidate for Congress, but in the opinion of many persons acting on his own motion and for the purpose of making money out of either party who would buy him, and perhaps out of both parties—a democratic lawyer of some ingenuity in a remote county alleged that he hired a man to substitute some false returns in the clerk's office and to procure a canvass by the county officers of the substituted returns and a certificate of the false result.

The county canvassing board was composed of a man who had been a republican, who was a member of the republican State convention of 1876, and voted, I believe, for Hayes, but voted for the democratic candidate for governor, and who was the clerk, and two other members, plain, ignorant men, who could neither read nor write.

You will remember that this occurred in a county far toward the south, recently settled, and where there was then little or no communication with the outside world.

This lawyer afterward swore that the clerk of the court was informed by him of his purpose to alter the returns, and was offered money by him to assist in making the alterations, but pointedly refused to have anything to do with it. This lawyer also swore that through a person who had been acting as deputy clerk, who also became State's evidence, he had the returns altered without the knowledge or consent of either of the members of the board, and that they were canvassed as altered.

These two men who swore that they had committed this crime testified that one of them was offered by a friend of Mr. Hull any amount of money he wanted if he would get Mr. Hull such a majority in the county as would make up the probable number of votes necessary to secure his election; and on the trial of these men in the United States court, on the promise of immunity to themselves as the condition of giving testimony against the others, they swore that these men whom they testified had refused to have anything to do with the alteration of the returns received money from one of them as a consideration for concealing their crime. This evidence was considered as sufficient to convict these men, two of whom could neither read nor write, as I am informed, of a conspiracy to give a false certificate of the result of the election in that county. The opinion of fair and impartial men has been that the fraud was conceived and executed by the two State's witnesses for their own interest, and with the intention of selling out to either party that would give them the most money; and when they found out that the secret detective service of the Government offered the highest price and was the best market for false and suborned witnesses, they sold out to them. However this may be, there is no doubt that the return was altered, just as it was in Alachua County by the republicans in 1876, and that the expectation was that they would be protected by the decision of the State court in the Alachua County case, and by the decision of the republican returning board and of the electoral commission, which held that the county board had the right to decide in regard to the genuineness of a return, and that this decision was final.

The difference was that in the case of 1876 the United States court indicted none of the parties who committed the fraud in the interest of the republican party, although they were intelligent men and themselves committed the fraud, but on the contrary rewarded them with office and promotion, while the Government spent large amounts of money and gave immunity to the acknowledged principals in this latter case to obtain a conviction of these three ignorant men. This is what you mean by a free ballot and a fair count.

In the State canvass the State board, with some division of opinion held, because of the character of the returns from Madison County, because of the certificate of the county canvassers that no true returns could be made of the vote in Madison County from the returns, that the vote of that county should not be counted, and for substantially the same reason that Brevard County should be rejected. This gave Mr. Hull a small majority.

The democrats of that district believe—I do myself—that the vote of Madison County ought to have been rejected because of the intimidation of white and colored voters by your deputy marshals and their refusal to allow a free ballot and a fair count to the people of that county. The democrats of that district generally believe that if all the dead men and the boys under age and the Georgia voters that voted the republican ticket there in that election were thrown out, Mr. Hull would have had a large majority. However this may be it is now useless to consider. The other House ultimately decided that the vote of Madison County ought to have been counted, and gave Mr. Bisbee the seat.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. CALL. Yes, sir.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator speaks of one being a little forgery and another a great forgery. I do not know much difference in the size of forgeries, but there was one little circumstance the Senator called my attention to and that seemed to justify my calling his attention to this fact, if he will allow me, that the man who profited by the fraud which he calls a little fraud sat in the House of Representatives until almost the last days of the session, a democrat, and then in the last days of the session the democratic House turned him out and put a republican in his place. That is a little circumstance I thought I would call the Senator's attention to.

Mr. CALL. My learned friend is capable of a much better argument than that. He has too much ability to waste his intellect upon this frivolous diagnosis of cases. That is not a proper view; that is not reasonable. The democrat was not turned out of Congress because of the vote in Brevard County, and this is what we have been considering, namely, a notable instance of fraud in Brevard County stated by the Senator from Massachusetts the other day, and which he made the foundation of a serious charge against the people of Florida, and one of a series of grave allegations against all the people of all the Southern States.

Mr. DAWES. I do not know anything about Brevard County. I am not acquainted very much in Florida. All I know is that he sat there during almost the whole Congress without any right to his seat, and the democrats turned him out at the end after he had got the pay for the whole term.

Mr. CALL. How do you know that he had no right to his seat? That will not do.

Mr. HAWLEY. A unanimous report of the committee showed it.

Mr. CALL. The democratic member of Congress——

Mr. DAWES. I understand from Senators who were members of the House that it was a unanimous vote. He never got a vote for himself there, and I suppose he did not get much from the people.

Mr. HAWLEY. I can perhaps enlighten the Senator from Florida a trifle upon that matter. The contest for the seat of Mr. Hull was waged by Mr. Bisbee, prolonged until the very last days of the Forty-sixth Congress. My recollection is that the committee made no report, or no fraction of the committee made a report, in favor of Mr. Hull. There was no argument in the House, and no man pretended to deny the right of Mr. Bisbee to the seat, and it was given to him by a practically unanimous vote of the whole House in the last few days of the session.

Mr. CALL. Will the Senator from Connecticut tell me what that has to do with the returns of Brevard County?

Mr. HAWLEY. If Brevard County was in that district I should guess perhaps there was something the matter with them.

Mr. CALL. There are a great many other counties in that district besides Brevard County.

Mr. HAWLEY. The fact is that Hull had no right under heaven to the seat, and the whole House said so after he had sat nearly two years.

Mr. CALL. I beg the gentleman's pardon. The House said that upon the case made in the report Mr. Hull had no right to his seat.

Mr. HAWLEY. There were very able democrats there.

Mr. CALL. The House gave the seat to Mr. Bisbee. That much is true. The return upon which Mr. Hull got the seat was a canvass of the State canvassing authorities by which they decided upon grounds satisfactory to my mind, and I think to that of all fair-minded people, that the vote of Madison County could not be counted, neither the democratic vote nor the republican vote in that county. They decided also that the vote of Brevard County could not be counted. The seat was given subsequently by the House to Bisbee upon investigation and proof because of other fractional votes and because the House held that that decision of the canvassing board was not a correct decision. They held that the vote of Madison County ought to have been counted.

Mr. President, I say, therefore, that in this matter of Brevard County, where there was a small vote, I think some one hundred and forty or one hundred and fifty, three poor ignorant men were unjustly convicted. The case upon the evidence which I have in my possession has no precedent in any court or in any system of laws, and is a discredit and a disgrace to the just and fair and impartial administration of justice—men convicted of knowing of the commission of a crime, and being in this sense accessory in a remote degree to it, by the evidence of the principals who receive immunity for giving the evidence to convict. This is my understanding of the result of the contest in the House; but we were not discussing that. Whatever that decision was it throws no light on the character of the alleged Brevard County fraud, and does not furnish any ground for the arraignment of the people of Florida made by the Senator from Massachusetts because of it.

Mr. DAWES. What was Mr. Hull indicted for?

Mr. CALL. He was indicted in order to make a republican place in the other House of Congress.

Mr. DAWES. What was the offense of these men?

Mr. CALL. What you call in that country when you get up a base and wicked persecution and prosecution against a man, a conspiracy.

Mr. DAWES. Was it or was it not for forgery?

Mr. CALL. And if you could succeed, I tell the honorable Senator, in establishing in Massachusetts that perfidious and false and perjured administration of law which you sometimes have of your election laws in the South he could be convicted there at any time of a conspiracy and put in the penitentiary upon better evidence than Mr. Hull was indicted upon. No, I say with great respect to the Senator from Massachusetts, this was——

Mr. DAWES. I know Massachusetts is pretty bad.

Mr. CALL. Nobody says she is bad.

Mr. DAWES. Until I came to hear the Senator from Florida I never dreamed of it; but coming to hear the Senator from Florida on Massachusetts, it seems she is pretty bad; but that is not the question: I asked the Senator what the offense charged in the indictment was.

Mr. CALL. A conspiracy.

Mr. DAWES. A conspiracy to do what?

Mr. CALL. That was the way they phrased it, a conspiracy.

Mr. DAWES. Conspiracy is not anything unless it is to do an unlawful act.

Mr. CALL. Well, you must not apply the same laws you have in Massachusetts to our tribunals and courts there when they are investigating election processes. Mr. Hull was indicted for an alleged conspiracy to procure the returns from Brevard County in his interest, a fraudulent conspiracy to falsify the election returns.

Mr. DAWES. Ah, to falsify an election return. I thought the proper name for that was forgery, but I am mistaken; it is to falsify! [Laughter.]

Mr. CALL. The Senator must brighten up his wit a little; he must study a little more to catch points like that. We are not talking about forgery or falsification; we are talking about the importance of a return, forged, if you please, in a congressional election in a county of 200 voters, a single instance, and of how far this may be made the foundation for a charge of fraud against all the people of the State.

Mr. DAWES. Does the Senator think it makes any difference with a forgery because a democrat and a republican together committed it?

Mr. CALL. I will tell you what I think it makes. In that remark on that day when you charged the democratic people of Florida with a noted instance of forgery of election returns, you charged it as a part of that great indictment of yours against the people of the South. Now it does make a great deal of difference whether that return was forged by democrats and in the interest of the democratic party or not; whether it was indorsed and approved or not; whether it was received or rejected. Does not the Senator think so? The proposition which I was endeavoring to call your attention to was this: do you want to discuss that point whether it is important to your proposition that it was done in the interest of the democratic party and by democrats or by the procurement of democrats and accepted and approved by the people of the State or not?

Mr. DAWES. I do not see that it makes any difference. I said there was a noted instance of forgery in Florida. That is what I said. I do not suppose it makes any difference whether the democrat got a republican to help him or not; it is just as much of a forgery.

Mr. CALL. It would have made some difference if in this case the republican had gotten the democrat to help him commit the fraud in the interest of the republican party.

Mr. DAWES. It would not make any difference whether the republican got the democrat or the democrat got the republican; it was forgery just the same; that is the question. The Senator wanted to know what I alluded to, and I innocently told him.

Mr. CALL. I will ask the Senator another question which I started out to ask him, and have been trying to reach for some time, if he will allow me. The Senator of course does not want to deceive anybody; he only wants to try to be witty at times, and he has regaled us with his splendid scintillations of wit and genius. Now, as the Senator has got something solid in him, I want to ask him a question, and I ask him if he was not honestly bound when he made that charge against the democrats, the white people of Florida, to tell also of republican forgeries in Alachua County which are spread upon the records of the whole country and proved beyond a doubt or a question? Mr. Hull was acquitted of the charge by a republican test-oath jury under a republican judge at a time when your public money and your Attorney-General used all the power of this Government to procure a conviction of him; and it is that abuse of power which shames the American people and the purity of justice that I wish to bring to your notice; and I ask the Senator if he was not honestly bound when he made this charge as to fraud in 140 votes committed in a remote county of Florida by two designing and three ignorant county officers, two of whom could neither read nor write, which the State canvassers rejected and refused to count—was he not bound to come out and speak of the republican forgery in Alachua County under the republican State administration by means of which the vote of Florida was beyond all question changed from Tilden to Hayes? You cannot deny it, because the very republicans who were cognizant at the time of its commission have come out and sworn to the facts and produced the original return, which was stolen, and in place of which the forged and false one was substituted.

If the Senator thinks it is right to do that, to make a charge resting upon one small circumstance against a people and withhold, where he has knowledge of it, a fraud to a much greater extent committed by those whom he represents as oppressed and innocent parties, very well. That is for him to reconcile to his own conscience, his own sense of right and justice and truth.

But, Mr. President, the honorable Senator from Maine charged me the other day with making an assault upon Massachusetts——

Mr. DAWES. Before the Senator passes to Maine I want to say that the last thing I would be guilty of would be doing injustice to the people of Florida, and I more regret than the Senator will give me credit for, I fear, the disclosure he makes that all parties indulge in forgery down there to carry their ends at elections. It is not of so much importance to me which side prevails in an honest election as it is to have an honest election.

Mr. CALL. I am very glad to hear the Senator express my views.

Mr. DAWES. I make war on a dishonest election anywhere and in the interest of any party. I had some such reputation when I was ten years on the Committee on Elections of the other House where I tried to maintain that doctrine. I am not here in defense of any forgery. I am exceedingly pained to hear the Senator say that all parties resort to it down in Florida.

Mr. CALL. That is as much of a non sequitur as the other. The Senator from Florida not only did not say that, but he expressly said that all parties did not commit frauds, and that the elections were not fraudulent. He is reproaching you for referring to the smaller, and making this charge when there are only two instances in the last four years, one of them a great fraud committed by the republicans in many counties and by the State canvassing board and which for four years the honorable Senator never said anything about, and I think perhaps he is excusable for that, considering his party relations and how zealously he stands by all that they do, whether right or wrong; the other one a very small fraud, a very doubtful one indeed as to the parties by whom it was committed and the purpose for which it was committed or the inducement for it, a fraud disapproved by all the people of the State, refused and rejected by the State canvassing board. For the first the parties committing it were rewarded by the honorable Senator and his party with high office and emoluments, and their work was approved and perpetuated by the distinguished Senator and his colleague. For the latter the parties really guilty were indicted in the State court, but were sought to be protected by the United States court as State's evidence; but the poor, ignorant accomplices, if such they were, were tried and convicted.

It is due to the honorable and distinguished gentleman N. A. Hull, of Florida, whose name has been brought into this controversy, to say that he was acquitted under circumstances which completely vindicate him and establish his innocence. No honester person or better man can be found anywhere; no man possesses more the confidence, the respect, and friendship of all who know him, democrats or republicans.

Now, Mr. President, I wish to say one other word. The Senator from Maine yesterday spoke of me as attacking Massachusetts, and he was pleased to do me the compliment to place me in the attitude of David and to inflict on the ancient and famous Commonwealth of Massachusetts the disgrace of likening her to the heathen Philistine, Goliath. I have not attacked Massachusetts. I honor the State of Massachusetts as much as the Senator from Massachusetts. I have said no word against her people, either the rich or the poor, against their great objects of government and their great institutions by which they promote the beneficent ends of humanity—not one word; all that I have said I said from the reports of Massachusetts and her census in regard to the inevitable evils which affect communities in dense populations.

I said then and say now that the intelligence, the education, the religion of Massachusetts and New England are doing all that can be done to alleviate the inevitable miseries of the human race; but I say to the Senator that still the fact is that you hold it necessary to prescribe conditions of intelligence, of virtue, of character, of property, of tax-paying upon the electoral suffrage; and what we demand of you is that you shall not assail us with a hypocritical and unjust and cruel assault upon our people when they simply seek to preserve the government of their States in the hands of the honest, the virtuous, the upright, and the true. I challenge you to prove any of these vile stories of cruelty and intimidation and murder, which every circumstance denounces to be false, and which no decent or honest or truthful man can be found to affirm or swear to; for I defy gentlemen to bring here a man who will testify of personal knowledge to any such transactions; and I say here that, living in that country all my life, I have never seen, I have never known, I have never heard of a single instance resting upon reasonable evidence of outrage because of political considerations upon black or white, and I defy you to bring any case upon reasonable evidence.

Mr. DAWES rose.

Mr. CALL. Has the Senator anything to produce? Let him speak it.

Mr. DAWES. I thought the Senator was about closing; but I will not interrupt him. I will wait until he is through.

Mr. CALL. Now, Mr. President, one would hardly have supposed that even the Senator from Maine, who gave us this extraordinary declaration of hostility to the people of the South, would have indulged in a statement like this:

> Thousands and tens of thousands of black voters were killed in cold blood in your Southern States.

Mr. President, I wish to say that I have never known and never heard of a single instance of outrage upon black or white for political reasons, and I defy you to the proof of it in my State. I know that there have been publications made, and I wish you would bring them here. I invite you to do so. I know individual names have been given, and I know the circumstances of the cases stated from public report. I know that, few as they are, the name of every man that has been killed for ten years has been gathered and published as killed because of political differences; and I know that a large portion of those men were democrats killed in personal broils and others of them fugitives from justice, killed under republican rule by republican officers. I know that one of the most bloody and cruel of all the murders in my State that have been committed was committed by a man by the name of Butler, a prominent and leading republican official, upon a poor negro of Escambia County; and this statement can be proved, and proved beyond a doubt.

Another shocking murder I have just mentioned. If you wish to compare crimes, and make the records of the Senate fouler than those of any criminal court, we can furnish you with crimes committed by your people and under your governments in the South far surpassing in numbers and atrocity and cruelty and horrid brutality anything which you can truthfully allege against us, and these we can prove, and the testimony will not be denied.

Mr. President, the honorable Senator from Maine speaks about suppressing returns; men indicted for not giving full effect to the vote in Texas and in Mississippi; he speaks of that as a barbarous thing. Why, what occurred in the Senator from Maine's own State a year ago; what occurred by the record of his own State's judicial tribunals? What occurred last year when the honorable Secretary of State, Mr. Blaine, telegraphed that Maine had been carried for the greenback candidates by fraud in the French plantations in Maine? I ask if a Senator coming from a State where the military authority was called upon to inaugurate the republican State government—I speak with no disrespect to the State of Maine—but I ask is it fair, is it reasonable, is it right that he should assail other States and talk of putting them under fire and sword, because he says there have been, not convictions on evidence but cases of indictment and parties pleading guilty, acknowledging irregularities, frauds, if you please, in the manner of making returns? In Philadelphia you have judges of election arraigned for false returns in the papers yesterday; you have in every State; your courts are filled more or less with election frauds.

I say that these statements of the Senator from Maine in regard to the State of Florida are untrue. Now, mark me, there was a man killed in Madison County at the time he referred to, but there was not intimidation of "witnesses afraid to speak because of murder," for the man murdered was a democrat and a white man, and he was murdered in cold blood by a witness who had testified; he was murdered without other provocation than slapping a man in the face. That is one of the cases. In the other case the train was stopped, but it was not stopped by persons in the interest of the democratic party, or stopped by men who were countenanced by the community, nor to obstruct the execution of process. There never was such a case before in the county of Madison, and the prisoners promptly reported upon the next train, for I was in the town of Jacksonville and saw them myself; and from that day to this nothing has been heard in regard to any resistance or obstruction of process there or violence until the republican colored man, right in the very presence of two white men, one of them the republican collector of internal revenue for Florida and the other a leading republican, shot to death and murdered in cold blood an amiable, peaceable young man, the support and comfort of an aged and now desolate mother.

Now as to the case of the man who was thrown over the baluster, I do not know anything about that. That is too small to talk about. Men will get drunk everywhere. I have no doubt there are a great many bad men who go about as deputies, and that they get drunk and that they abuse their authority, and I have no doubt that oftentimes it is so in Massachusetts, though the Senator from Maine would have us understand there was not an assault and battery in Maine on election days and there was not any violence in Massachusetts; he would have us understand there was no such thing as unlawful force in all this great country in the North when the papers are full of it, the records of the courts are full of it everywhere; and I will guarantee that in Massachusetts, in Rhode Island, notwithstanding your laws by which you prevent so large a number of people from voting, you have as many cases of unlawful violence and intimidation as there are in Florida or in any other State. You may take the records of your courts and compare them, and I guarantee you have as many cases of assault and battery, as many cases of drunkenness; and when men are drunk there is always more or less fighting. I see here in Massachusetts a large proportion of your criminal convictions are for drunkenness, eight hundred and more a year, a very large proportion in the table of your own Massachusetts census, and several hundred more for disturbing the peace. Yet the Senator from Maine relates with tragic power and great oratorical frenzy a case of some man in Mississippi beating a colored man on the head and his living. The crime was, I suppose, that he was a colored man and they were not.

I say, then, Mr. President, with regard to my own State of Florida the instances cited by the Senator from Maine are not true. I challenge him and I challenge any gentleman on the other side to bring a case, name the place, the time, and the circumstance, and I will meet it with evidence to the contrary.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, I will not detain the Senate more than a very few moments. The Senator from Florida seems to complain that we do not continually reply to his assaults upon Massachusetts. Mr. President, my colleague and myself made what to our minds and to the minds of our people was an unanswerable reply to the Senator from Florida. We showed by the figures, we showed in every way possible that the idea that any man was prohibited by law from coming to the polls in Massachusetts by any of the restrictions that the Senator had been pleased to call to the attention of the Senate was an error, to term it mildly. There was no ground for it.

The Senator was not satisfied either with the figures or with the history, and has repeated over and over again the self-same answered statement, and now gets up and complains that we will not answer him continually. I do not know of anything that can be made an answer to the fact that two and two make four, and when a man says they make five and I demonstrate to him once that the result is only four, if he is not satisfied I leave him alone.

Mr. CALL. Will the Senator allow me to ask a question? I will not trouble him much.

Mr. DAWES. Certainly.

Mr. CALL. Of course the Senator from Massachusetts deserves the high position which he holds. I accord that to him. I have great respect for him. He is a man of intellect and of learning. As such he unquestionably wishes to meet every proposition fairly. Now I wish to ask the honorable Senator, does he deny the statement contained in this census as to the number of legal voters in the State of Massachusetts? We need not discuss this; we can easily fix it. I am right or the Senators from Massachusetts are. It is a matter of a few figures. The Senator can answer the question.

Mr. DAWES. I do not know what the statement is, and I do not want to go over again the figures. I have been over the figures with the Senator.

Mr. CALL. Then I will acknowledge I am wrong if it turns out so. If you will deny this statement and the number does not come out of disfranchised people that I stated, I will acknowledge right here that I am wrong.

Mr. DAWES. If the Senator wants to restate it, I do not object.

Mr. CALL. I do not want to restate it. I want to know if you deny it.

Mr. DAWES. Will the Senator make another statement?

Mr. CALL. No, I will ask you a question.

Mr. DAWES. I was going on to say, Mr. President——

Mr. CALL. I will not interrupt you. Go on.

Mr. DAWES. I was going on to say that the figures, the tables which Massachusetts herself furnishes, demonstrate that of all nationalities there are in Massachusetts about eighteen thousand persons who have not chosen to avail themselves of the opportunities which Massachusetts furnishes to be able to read and write. Of these, thirteen or fourteen thousand are foreigners. How long they have been in Massachusetts the tables do not show. The laws of the United States require that they should be five years in the country before they can be naturalized, and the laws of Massachusetts require a residence of one year in Massachusetts after the acquisition of citizenship. If they have resided in Massachusetts one year with the knowledge that at the end of that year they could vote in Massachusetts if they would only learn to read and write and Massachusetts says you may have the opportunity for nothing, and they say "rather than avail ourselves of these privileges we will abandon and give over the franchise of voting," I for one—the Senator may look upon it differently—do not understand that the State of Massachusetts deprives such a man of the right of voting. I understand that the man deprives himself of it. There is just the difference between the Senator and myself. There are in Massachusetts less than three thousand native-born citizens, who do not take interest enough in the government under which they live——

Mr. HOAR. Twenty-one hundred.

Mr. DAWES. Twenty-one hundred, my colleague says, who has the figures—2,100 native-born citizens of Massachusetts who do not take interest enough in the laws under which they live to qualify themselves for voting.

Mr. HOAR. My colleague will permit me. That is the number of males over ten years, not over twenty-one, who cannot read and write—2,100.

Mr. DAWES. Over ten years of age. I do not care so far as my argument is concerned whether the number be more or less. Any man in Massachusetts who wants to vote can. Any man who does not care to qualify himself for a voter and gives up a voluntary privilege can with no propriety be said to be driven, as the Senator from Georgia expressed it, from the polls by our constitution and laws. The Senator from Florida has told us that in his own State he never saw the instance of a man having been by intimidation driven from the polls. I say to the Senator that I accept that statement——

Mr. CALL. I did not mean to say that. I meant an outrage more serious than that. I have no doubt that men both democrats and republicans are excluded at times, but I never saw it.

Mr. DAWES. I do not dispute the Senator; I accept his statement. Now will he accept one from me and let us give this thing over? I have been over thirty years in the politics of Massachusetts; I am sorry to be compelled in this audience to confess to so many years. This provision of our constitution has been a part of our constitution about twenty-five years. Now I say to the Senator that although I have mingled in the canvass every year for the last twenty-five years, more or less, and I have been at every election, I never saw a man in Massachusetts go away from her polls because he could not read and write. My colleague said he never knew a native-born citizen of Massachusetts who could not read and write. I happen to know one man, and I know but one native-born citizen of Massachusetts over twenty-one years of age who cannot read and write. I never saw in Massachusetts a man excluded from the ballot-box, of any nationality in the world because he could not read and write. Doubtless there have been some who have voluntarily given it up; but in all my experience in Massachusetts I never saw an instance. Foreigners are naturalized there, as they are everywhere else, just before election, and they qualify themselves. They voluntarily go to school and their political friends are the school-teachers. All that is required of a man is to write his name and read the constitution in the English language. We have got a notion, as I said before, that a man is a more valuable citizen who is able to read the ballot which he puts into the box. It may be an error in Massachusetts, but it exists there, and we have an impression in Massachusetts that our citizens are more valuable citizens, that our laws are better, and that our rulers are better, when the men who make the rulers and make the laws know what is on the piece of paper that makes them. That may be a mistake, and with the Senator from Florida I will not argue that question. I have frequently suggested to the Senator from Florida and other Senators that the stuffing of ballots, the putting of tissue ballots into the box was not an evil that affected merely the particular ballot-box and the result of that ballot-box alone, but that it affected everybody in this country; that this has come to be a nation depending upon honest ballots, and that a ballot dropped into the box in Florida tells upon the character of the nation to Oregon and from sea to sea; that it is an evil from which not the Southern States for themselves but for the country ought to be rescued; that it is an evil that does not begin and end with putting down the republican party in the Southern States; it is an evil that will come home to plague the inventors.

I have been sustained in this position wonderfully since this debate commenced by able and philosophic political writers within their own midst. They have found that the instrumentality they used to crush out republican majorities in their States is already returning to plague the inventors, and say, with a coolness and a frankness altogether admirable, that while it is all very well to use tissue ballots to drive republicans out of power, it is quite another and a more serious thing when you use them among yourselves. They just begin to wake up to the fact that this is an instrumentality that can be turned upon themselves and among themselves.

Let me commend to the Senators on the other side the Charleston (South Carolina) News of March 12 on this subject. The Senator from South Carolina knows whether it is authority among the democracy or not; and I read it with a view of calling the attention of Senators to the fact that this which was all well enough when turned on republican majorities they cry out themselves against the moment it is used among themselves. It is a thing they cannot doubt; it must be crushed out altogether or it is an enemy that will blow up those who use it. Now I will read:

South Carolina is as determined to have fair elections as to retain good local government. Precisely how this will be done nobody can say at this moment.

If you would hear the Senators on the other side one would suppose it had already been done; that nothing was so fair in this fair creation of God as elections in the Southern States; but the Charleston News says how it is going to be done it does not exactly see yet. Let me read that clause again:

Precisely how this will be done nobody can say at this moment; but it will be accomplished somehow.

Yes, sir; "somehow." It may not be until those who have invented this instrumentality shall feel themselves the curse come home to them, that they will realize that the existence of popular government in this country depends upon honest voting and honest counting.

The State will not be fit—

Hear this:

The State will not be fit to live in or be worth saving if that which was a desperate remedy is to become our daily food.

If that to which we resorted to crush out republican majorities in South Carolina is permitted to be daily practiced among us the State will not be fit to live in! I do not know but that I shall spoil this by interjecting my own remarks.

There is danger already that some engineers will be hoist with their own petard.

They are just waking up down in South Carolina, while Senators here are turning their batteries on Massachusetts, to the fact that they are in danger of being hoist by their own petard.

Last year, in Charleston, one set of democrats stuffed the ballot-boxes at a primary election to defeat another set of democrats who had received a majority of the votes cast; and this very week, at a municipal election in the rigidly democratic county of Lexington, the ballot-box was so stuffed that the managers of election refused to canvass the votes.

They are in danger of being hoist by their own petard. Now, here is the beauty of it:

Doubtless the pleasure is as great
Of being cheated as to cheat.

But that will not do as to democrats.

But democrats are not so philosophical. In their eyes, cheating as a means of securing honest government is a widely different thing from cheating for the benefit of local "workers" and machine-made office-seekers.

Cheating to secure honest government! That is a beauty in morals. That is almost equal to the awfully moral condition of Massachusetts as depicted by my distinguished friend from Florida. That would do for the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. JONAS] to have read at the Clerk's desk, instead of the account of a poor, unfortunate man being caught in a burglary. To cheat for the sake of keeping an honest government! That is beautiful.

Mr. JONAS. Will the Senator from Massachusetts permit me to have something else read from the Clerk's desk?

Mr. DAWES. Not in the midst of this.

Mr. JONAS. In answer to it.

Mr. DAWES. No, sir; this is "a gem," all by itself, "of purest ray serene." I am going to read this line over again—the Senator will excuse me—

But democrats are not so philosophical,

They have not got to taking being cheated as republicans have. They tell a story up in Massachusetts of an eel that got so used to being skinned that he did not take any notice of it. That is the way with the poor republicans down there; they have got so used to being trampled in the dust, and their votes snowed under by tissue ballots, and their brains blown out when they come to the polls, that they do not go there any more:

There is always one way to insure absolute honesty—

at elections, and that is by interesting the white people in a free ballot and a fair count.

Yes, sir; interest the white people in a free ballot and a fair count, and it will be so. The colored people do not need that teaching; the colored people understand it now. But one way, and the only way, according to this philosophical political writer, is to impress upon the white people the necessity of having a free ballot and a fair count. The only way to secure an honest ballot is to secure those who dominate in the interest of a free ballot and a fair count, and then you will have it:

There is always one way to insure absolute honesty—

It is absolute the moment they will be honest—

at elections, and that is by interesting the white people in a free ballot and a fair count.

Now, hear:

When our pleasant vices, so to speak, are likely to be made into whips to scourge us, we are in the humor to mend our lives.

Yes, when these pleasant vices of ours that we played off on the poor darkies are whips in the hands of white people to scourge us, then we are likely to mend our ways! When these evil practices return to plague their inventors, their inventors will be likely to mend their ways! This is not my language, sir. This I take to be sound democratic doctrine; and it is an opening in a dark and black ground. It is a little light breaking in upon those who have taken hold of unlawful instruments, and have only found that they are about to receive upon their own heads the blows they have meant for others.

It is to try to make those white people in the South who begin to speak out in this way understand that their interests as well as others are identified with this great fundamental principle of the Government itself, a free ballot and a fair count, that the republican party calls to its aid all re-enforcements who are ready to enlist in such a warfare, and does not stop to inquire whether those who come and stand by its side in this warfare are of a stature equal or measure according to the regulation standard or not. It is a warfare so important that any man who can strike a blow in its interest is worthy of a place in the ranks; and those opposing us see it just as plainly as we do.

The talk here upon this floor about the "unholy alliance" of republicans with readjusters finds no place in that Virginia where this struggle is going on. I hold in my hand the evidence of it. Men of high position in the democratic party in that State are sounding the alarm, and democrats of that State are willing to make common cause with readjusters provided readjusters will only stand with them to crush out the poor, unfortunate, weak, and defenseless colored voter in that State.

Yesterday's Dispatch—

This is of the 16th of April, the organ of that Bourbon democracy of Virginia represented on this floor by those who defy the will of the majority and try to make the country believe it is because they will not have anything to do with a readjuster.

Yesterday's Dispatch has a long communication on "The Duty of the Virginia Democracy," of which the gist is found in its concluding sentence.

And here it is:

"For one I am willing"—

This is an old Bourbon democrat; I know it.

"For one I am willing to elect a readjuster governor and a readjusting legislature, provided"—

Only hear—

"Provided they are democrats, true to Virginia, true to democratic principles, and true to Caucasian supremacy."

That is it. Any democrat covered all over with readjusting leprosy, covered all over with this abominable heresy, is good enough for this Bourbon for governor or for the Legislature, provided he will join with them to put the white man on top of the negro. He signs himself—

"A debt-paying democrat."

The Dispatch adds:

"The above is from an ex-member of Congress who has always heretofore been what the pen-name signifies. The last sentence"—

Namely, "Caucasian supremacy"—

"would make a good platform for county meetings."

This is the platform down in Virginia. While our friends on the other side are wasting their strength in this warfare on the ground that it is necessary in order to draw a line of non-intercourse with any democrat who is a readjuster, while they are doing all this, the democrats of Virginia, seeing what the battle is, seeing that it means a free ballot for all, whether they be Caucasians or not, in their distress cry out, "We will forgive you your readjusting; we will forgive you all your sins, provided you will join with us and see to it that these poor negroes shall not vote."

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. DAWES. Certainly.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I should like the Senator from Massachusetts to tell me and the country what he understands by the phrase "Bourbon democrat." I have heard that phrase repeated here time and again. I profess in all sincerity to be a democrat of the old school. It has not changed its principles and does not propose to do it. The term "Bourbon democrat" must be susceptible of some distinct definition, and I should like for some gentleman on the other side of the Chamber to tell us what the words "Bourbon democrat" mean now as distinguished from the word "democrat" in the days of Thomas Jefferson and Andrew Jackson.

Mr. DAWES. I will tell the Senator with great pleasure. My colleague gave the definition the other day. It is not original with me but it cannot be bettered. A Bourbon of the present day is a man who learns nothing new and forgets a great deal. The democrat of to-day thinks he is right where the democrat was away back of the war. The Senator from Florida carries it back to Jefferson. There were not any democrats in his days. The Senator has got before the beginning. Jefferson was a republican in those days; but the Senator has gone back to the beginning; and with great frankness the Senator wants to know the difference between a Bourbon democrat of to-day and a Bourbon back as early as you can date. There is not any difference. He is now just what he was then. He has not learned the slightest thing in the movement of this world, has forgotten all that has happened, has forgotten that he undertook to take 4,000,000 men and rivet their chains around their limbs and carry them into free territory and call their roll in the shadow of Bunker Hill. He has forgotten all that. He has forgotten that in order to do it he made war, and he has forgotten what a disastrous defeat came upon him, and how in the heat of the battle the manacles were melted off the limbs of the 4,000,000 slaves; how in spite of him the slave was made a citizen after he had been made a freeman, and then a voter. He has forgotten all this. Why, sir, the world has moved on in twenty-five years. Has not the Senator even dreamed of that fact? Does he really think that a man can be an effective, active, live democrat now and be just what a democrat was twenty-five years ago?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I do.

Mr. DAWES. A Bourbon democrat is correctly described by my colleague as a man who learned nothing in these last twenty-five years and has forgotten everything that has happened.

Mr. CALL. I should like to ask my honorable friend from Massachusetts if under that definition of a Bourbon democrat he does not mean and cannot express it more briefly by saying a man that cannot vote under the laws of Massachusetts. [Laughter.]

Mr. DAWES. I declare, Mr. President, "still harping on my daughter." [Laughter.]

Mr. HAMPTON. I see the Senator from Massachusetts has taken his seat and I suppose the play is over. There are parts of that editorial, as I believe it was, which he has read from a Charleston paper which do contain good democratic doctrine; but they are not to be translated in the way that he proposes to translate them. That paper is striving to repress all frauds in the State. I have not said here, nor will I say anywhere, that there have not been frauds. I can say, and I can say it with a clear conscience, that I have never been connected with one, and that not by any act, any word, any deed, or any thought of mine has there ever been a fraud committed. I have advocated the rights of the colored people in South Carolina. I have tried to bring our people up to that point and to show them that where both races were brought together in the providence of God on a common soil their interests were identical. I have tried to prove that; I have told the white man and I have told the colored man that they were friends, that they were born on that soil, the same sun shone upon them, and when we passed hence we should both lie together in the bosom of our common mother. I have told them that and I have appealed to the colored people to support good men for office there, to elect only such as would do justice to them; and my appeals were not unheeded. I say it with entire confidence and I say it with equal pride, and I have said it in South Carolina to audiences of white men, that I owed my election as governor to the colored voters of South Carolina. Had they not listened to the appeals I made, had many of them not gone for me, I should not have been elected.

The Senator who spoke yesterday gave the figures, in part, of the vote in South Carolina. He said the census showed that there were 75,000 white men voters to 110,000 colored men at that time. I accepted that statement; I believed that was about the basis when the election commenced; but I believed then that I should be able to carry on an average of five hundred colored men in every county, and I carried more than that. I received 92,000 votes; and remember—I beg the Senator from Massachusetts to remember—that when that vote was polled every election officer in South Carolina was a republican, every office in South Carolina from governor to constable was in the hands of republicans, all the election machinery was in the hands of republicans, and if there were any frauds they must have been committed by them.

Upon that point I will disabuse the minds of the people of a common error that has obtained in regard to that election. It has been more than once said that if Mr. Hayes carried the State Governor Chamberlain must necessarily have done it also. By the laws of South Carolina the vote for governor and lieutenant-governor is sealed up by the managers of election and sent to the house of representatives, to be opened by the speaker. No other agency touches it, and therefore that vote cannot be tampered with, and the returns showed that I had received over 92,000 votes. The returns for the presidential electors went to the returning board composed of republican officials. What they did with those returns I cannot say; but this I will say, and I have said it before, that by those returns Mr. Hayes carried the State by 236 votes, if my memory serves me aright. That is, the lowest elector on the republican ticket beat by that number of votes the highest elector on the democratic ticket. I accepted that. Mr. Hayes, therefore, by the returns carried the State of South Carolina, and I never made any contest against that. I always said if the returns were shown to me that would prove that he carried the State, by no word or by no act of mine would I endeavor to falsify those returns.

Mr. President, the spirit in which the words quoted there by the Senator from Massachusetts, saying that the way to make the ballot pure was to insist upon the white men trying to have a fair count, were used means this, and nothing more: There are men in South Carolina who are struggling for that great object; there are men there who know we are confronted with the gravest problem ever given to a people for solution, and there are men there who know we have submitted more than any freemen on the American continent; and I say to the Senator from Massachusetts if he would reverse the picture, if he could and the liberty-loving people of Massachusetts could in one moment see all their government overturned, if he could see ignorance and vice and inexperience immediately placed in high power, if there could be an immigration of Chinese (even as intelligent people as they) who should come into that State and take possession of every office in that State, and if they would, without paying one dollar of tax themselves, tax the property-owners there to practical confiscation, it would not be forty-eight hours before those Chinamen would be hung to the nearest lamp-post in Massachusetts. I say that; and yet for years and years of agony we went through that; we were subjected to that, and subjected to it not by republicans, because there is a mistake that you gentlemen of the North make when you speak of the carpet-bagger as a republican. He is not a republican; he is a bird of prey; he is a thief and nothing but a thief, as a general rule.

I admit, I admit cheerfully, that in the Northern States you have most of the wealth, much of the culture, the education, the refinement, and all the elements of power in the republican ranks; but when you compare the republicanism of the South to the republicanism of the North you make as great a mistake as you could do upon anything on the face of the earth. It is not the same party; they are not the same men; and all that we ask of you is to let us try and deal with this great problem and meet it like men and like Christian men. We want to do it; we want to lift up the South; we want to contribute to the prosperity of the whole country; and there are men all through that country who know that fraud, that violence, that intimidation, that anything of that sort reacts upon a people.

I used that very expression which is quoted in that article, more than two years ago, when I was nominated for the second time for governor. I heard a whisper in the State, in one corner of the State, that some frauds might be resorted to; but I said on the public stand there "if that is done I warn you, I warn any people who practice it that this returning board is now composed of gentlemen, and that if anything is brought before them they will expose the fraud," and I knew the men of whom I said that, and when the day for canvassing the returns came they notified the chairmen of the respective committees that they would remain in session to get in protests from any county in the State, and so anxious were they to do their duty that they remained in session until twelve o'clock that night and yet no protest came.

I propose at some future time to answer the misstatements of the Senator who spoke yesterday, to give them the mildest name, in regard to South Carolina, but I propose to do it upon his return. Now I simply say that we feel that by educating the white men to insist upon a fair count we can more effectually accomplish that than by any other means. I want to see that done.

Mr. DAWES rose.

Mr. HAMPTON. Does the Senator propose——

Mr. DAWES. Not to interrupt.

Mr. HAMPTON. I desire to see that done as much as any other man; but the Senator may not perhaps know it. But when voices from Massachusetts were saying that the negro was not fit to vote, when the voice came from the great war governor of Indiana taking the same ground, in South Carolina immediately after the war I, a confederate soldier, a slave-owner, gave the first utterance that I heard after the war advising the white people of South Carolina to confer the ballot upon the colored man. I did that; I did it because I knew that in a republic when men are made citizens you cannot debar any one race or any one man from voting because he is black or because he is of any other color. I realized that it was necessary to do it, and I wanted then to guard the purity of the ballot-box and the elective franchise by having qualified suffrage such as you have in Massachusetts. More than that: when there was called a convention to give us a new constitution I advised that they should just take the constitution of Massachusetts word for word and letter for letter, and adopt that, because it is the strongest State-rights constitution of any in all the thirty-eight States. I proposed that.

Mr. President, occupying the ground that I have done in regard to the colored race, I think that I know something about them, and that I can say something for them. I think I have done something for them, and I will try to do more; but it is not the way to help us in the South to heap calumny and abuse on our people. I have never made any reflection upon any of my sister States. I do not propose to do so unless I have to "carry the war into Africa."

But, Mr. President, I referred just now to the speech of Governor Morton. I happened to-day to get hold of that speech, and I will read a portion of it to show that I have not misstated his position. It was delivered in Richmond, Indiana, in September, 1865:

> The right to vote carries with it the right to hold office. You cannot say that the negro has a natural right to vote, but that he must vote only for white men for office. The right to vote carries with it the right to be voted for. When that right is conferred, you can make no discrimination, no distinction against the right to hold office, and the right to vote in a State carries with it the right to vote for President and members of Congress, and for all Federal officers. The right of suffrage being conferred in South Carolina, for State purposes, under our Constitution, as I have before pointed out, carries with it the right to vote for President and Vice-President and members of Congress.
> In regard to the question of admitting the freedmen of the Southern States to vote, while I admit the equal rights of all men, and that in time all men will have the right to vote without distinction of color or race, I yet believe that in the case of four millions of slaves just freed from bondage, there should be a period of probation and preparation before they are brought to the exercise of political power. * * * To say that such men—and it is no fault of theirs, it is simply their misfortune and the crime of this nation—to say that such men, just emerging from this slavery, are qualified for the exercise of political power, is to make the strongest pro-slavery argument I ever heard. It is to pay the highest compliment to the institution of slavery.
> What has been our practice for many years? We have invariably described slavery as degrading both to the body and the soul. We have described it as bringing human beings down to the level of the beasts of the field. We have described it as a crime, depriving the slaves of intellectual and moral culture, and of all the gifts which God has made the most precious. If we shall now turn round and say that this institution has been a blessing to the negro instead of a curse; that it has qualified him for the right of suffrage and the exercise of political power, we shall stultify ourselves and give the lie to those declarations upon which we have gained political power.

Mr. President, these were the expressions of a stalwart republican and a wise and far-seeing statesman, and the great fault in this whole movement was that unlimited universal suffrage was conferred instantaneously upon the colored man. But that has been done; it is irrevocable; it is fraught with infinite evils and dangers, and leaves to us to solve the gravest problem that ever was presented for statesmanship to a people. Now we ask help. We shall not get help by denunciation. We know that there have been irregularities and frauds. I admit it, but I plead as the only justification the cruel wrongs which have been inflicted upon our people. It was a case where the very civilization, the property, the life, the State itself, were all involved. I admit that there were frauds; I admit that they were wrong. I will go as far as anybody in making those admissions. I announce here, as I have done everywhere, my unalterable determination to try by the best possible means and at the earliest possible moment to rectify these wrongs; but you are not going in the right way to do it. Such lectures as we get from our friends on the other side, and notably from the Senator from Massachusetts who is the great leader in this battle, do no good. While he was just now casting his eyes up and going into the realm of poetry, speaking of the "gems of purest ray serene" some lines flashed into my mind:

> A man may cry Church! Church! at every word
> With no more piety than other people;
> A daw's not reckoned a religious bird
> Because it keeps a-cawing from a steeple!

Mr. JONAS. Mr. President——

Mr. DAWES. Will the Senator from Louisiana let me say a word?

Mr. JONAS. I will only occupy one moment, sir. The honorable Senator from Massachusetts had hardly taken his seat yesterday after reading from a paper when I telegraphed to Louisiana for information, and I am advised that a full and complete vindication of the people of Caldwell Parish will be forwarded to me immediately. I congratulate the Senator from Massachusetts that he seems at last to have located his man in the right place, and as I judge from the tenor of the dispatches in the place where he is wanted, if not on his plantation at least by the people of Louisiana. I read a dispatch from the lieutenant-governor of Louisiana, who resides in the adjoining parish, a gentleman of as high character as any in our State or in the South, Lieutenant-Governor McEnery; he says:

MONROE, LOUISIANA, April 21, 1881.

Senator B. F. JONAS:

Have sent statement to Democrat; will be reported to Washington; too lengthy to wire to you. Heath's statement absolutely false. Property burned to obtain insurance. Insured for four thousand, valuation by appraisers to adjust loss fourteen hundred. Matter investigated by grand jury at last term, and a letter from Judge Bridger says that at the July term sufficient evidence will have been obtained to find bill.

S. D. MCENERY.

I am also in receipt of a letter from Massachusetts, a portion of which I will read. I have not been authorized to furnish the name of the writer. He says:

> Mr. DAWES's white-haired man is very well known in this eastern section of Massachusetts and his reputation for truth and honesty is not such as Mr. DAWES ought for a moment to think of, much less defend and espouse.

I have telegraphed to this gentleman for authority to use his name. I presume he is a respectable gentleman and a citizen of Peabody, Massachusetts. As I am not authorized at present to disclose his name, I do not do it for fear that it might imperil his life in Massachusetts. [Laughter.]

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, I think perhaps the Senator, from his stand-point and from the society in which he dwells, might very well feel that it was necessary to have some caution if he made public such a statement as that in reference to a respectable citizen.

I wish to say, Mr. President, that calling upon the Secretary of the Navy this morning, without any suggestion of mine he read the statement which was read yesterday from the Clerk's desk and said that he was well acquainted with this Mr. Heath and with his brother in New Orleans, that they were both highly respectable gentlemen and that many of the facts narrated in that statement he knew of his own personal knowledge to be true. I have no doubt that the Senator from Louisiana is authorized to say that although they have not evidence enough to indict this man, they will have it before July. [Laughter.] I have no doubt he is authorized to state so, and I think it very probable they will. The Senator can understand now, if he did not before, why I had some reluctance in giving his name when I first made the statement. That is all I desire to say at this time as to that matter. I am not troubled about any statement any man in Massachusetts whose name the Senator is afraid to give may make as to what I say on this floor. The people of Massachusetts, as I have said before, know me pretty well, and I have never had any trouble to convince them of my honesty of purpose, and do not think that anything the Senator will get by telegraph from Massachusetts will put me on the stand.

Mr. SAULSBURY. The letter did not refer to the Senator's veracity but the veracity of his informant.

Mr. DAWES. Is not the Senator from Louisiana able to speak for himself?

Mr. JONAS. I did not hear.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I do not know that that is evidence of very good raising on the part of the Senator from Massachusetts. I simply wanted to correct him.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator may not be a proper judge about that.

Mr. JONAS. The Senator will permit me. I did not hear the remark. Here is the letter I read and there was nothing in the letter reflecting on the Senator. I will read it again.

Mr. DAWES. I did not suppose there was, nor do I suppose that the Senator would think it would be reflecting on me to state or insinuate that I had manufactured what he called a cock-and-bull story here, and I do not propose——

Mr. JONAS. Will the Senator permit me to say that I propose to read the letter if he will permit me? It explains itself; it says:

> Mr. DAWES's white-haired man is very well known in this eastern section of Massachusetts, and his reputation for truth and honesty is not such as Mr. DAWES ought for a moment to think of, much less defend and espouse.

Mr. DAWES. Well, Mr. President, I do not know how about that. He has been thirteen years in the Senator's State, and if he has acquired a bad reputation down there, I am sorry for it. The Senator from Louisiana and I will have no quarrel about this thing. I have put this man's statement on the record, and the man must stand for himself. All I know about the man I have told to the Senate, and I am entirely content to let his statement stand. I have abundance of just such testimony crowded upon me every day; I could spend much of the time of the Senate every day in putting upon record reliable testimony of this character; but I do not care to do it.

I used this man's name simply to assure the Senators from Mississippi that a man could come back to Massachusetts, a respectable man when he went down there, and tell his story, and it would be believed in Massachusetts. That was the purpose for which I used it. I still think so. I may be mistaken.

The people of Massachusetts have heard over and over again these stories that there is no violence there and no fraud, and yet within fifteen minutes they have heard the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. HAMPTON] confess it. We are slanderers when we say it is so, and yet when the Senator is confronted with the evidence from the leading city in his State and the leading paper in his State, then he gets up and confesses it, says that he struggled manfully to try to bring his people up to an abandonment of it, and up to having an honest ballot, up to having a fair count. And I think after the confession of the authorship of negro suffrage in the South by the Senator from South Carolina we shall hear no more complaint of its being forced upon them by the republican party of the North; and I think after the statement of the honorable Senator from South Carolina that he wanted the people of South Carolina to adopt the constitution of Massachusetts bodily, with all its limitations and all its qualifications, as the best constitution in the world, I can turn my unhappy friend from Florida [Mr. CALL] over to him, and let him thrash him to his heart's content. [Laughter.] I will do no more; I will take no more trouble. I know my colleague is tired of convincing him over and over again.

A man convinced against his will Holds to the same opinion still—whether he lives in Florida or anywhere else.

But what I want to call the attention of the Senate and the country to is the broad confession on the part of the Senator from South Carolina of the struggle that he has gone through, the effort that he has made among the people over whom he exercises such a wide and controlling influence to induce them to be honest at the ballot-box. I read an interview that the Senator from South Carolina had two or three years ago—I do not know of course whether it is authentic or not—found in this same paper in which he complained of the clumsy manner in which these frauds were being perpetrated and said that they had hurt us at the North. It sounded so exactly like that whipping the boy for stealing and getting caught, that I thought of that matter when I read it. I do not suppose the Senator is responsible for that interview. I only called it up in connection with the statement of the Senator. But here after weeks of absolute denial on that side of the Chamber of frauds and of violence the evidence of which burdens the air and comes on every wire, rises the Senator from South Carolina with a broad confession that so far as South Carolina is concerned there has been one notable instance of a man of much influence seeing further than others have seen that this fraudulent use of the ballot-box could be made to turn and rend them and has tried—I take his own words—has tried to bring his people up and educate them to see, as he says he has seen, the absolute necessity of a free and fair ballot, admitting, sir——

Mr. HAMPTON. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. DAWES. In one moment. Admitting, sir, that these frauds were resorted to to put down carpet-bag governments and seeking to excuse their authors on the ground of the enormity of the evil they were to overcome, declaring every carpet-bagger to be a thief. Does he mean to put in that category such men as Governor Chamberlain, his predecessor? Does he mean to put in that category all the men who were occupying honorable and trustworthy positions in the Army and in civil life in the North who have gone down there and struggled honestly to identify themselves with the interests of those people? That there have been bad men who have gone down to the South is only to say that there are bad men everywhere.

But, Mr. President, what are called the carpet-bag governments in the South will, when history shall write accurately the dealings of the local governments and the policy and purity of local governments in the States of this Union, compare favorably with any that have succeeded them. I do not hesitate to say that with exceptions of dishonest men in what are called carpet-bag governments as a whole history will take care of them and do justice to them by the side of the governments that have succeeded them, and at the same time will put the stamp of condemnation upon the means such as the Senator from South Carolina has this day confessed were resorted to to overthrow them. For what did the Senator from South Carolina want negro suffrage in the South if he did not want the ballot of the negro counted fairly and honestly? Why is it that all over the South the cry is the Caucasian race against the poor colored voter? If the ballot in the hands of the colored man originated in the brain and in the political philosophy of the Senator from South Carolina, why has he not striven at the same time while he has been trying to educate up those in South Carolina, to lift his voice in Alabama, in Mississippi, in Louisiana——

Mr. MORGAN. Did I understand the Senator from Massachusetts to say that the voice of the negroes is stifled in elections in Alabama?

Mr. DAWES. I did not quite hear the Senator.

Mr. MORGAN. I asked the Senator whether I understood him to say that the voice of the negroes at the ballot-box is stifled in Alabama?

Mr. DAWES. I have some such impression.

Mr. MORGAN. Does the honorable Senator announce the fact, or does he mean in announcing the fact to say that he has knowledge or information that such is the fact?

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, I expressed what was my firm conviction founded upon what seemed to me in the records of the country and in the testimony of men to be evidence that authorized such a conviction, and I do not have a particle of doubt about it.

Mr. MORGAN. Now will the honorable Senator allow me to inquire, when he says he has no particle of doubt about it, the name of the record, or of the witness, or the election in reference to which he makes that assertion before the Senate of the United States?

Mr. DAWES. I did not quite hear the Senator.

Mr. MORGAN. That is strange.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator does not speak quite loud enough.

Mr. MORGAN. Will the honorable Senator inform the Senate of the name of the record, or of the witness, or the occasion upon which he ventures to make the assertion that the negro in Alabama has not had a fair opportunity to vote and to have his vote counted?

Mr. DAWES. Well, Mr. President, it is late this evening, and I have not the evidence upon which I came to that conclusion on my person at present. I would say to the Senator that I did not come willingly to that conclusion. I have come to the conclusion reluctantly that there has been a settled purpose in very many of the Southern States, including the State of Alabama, to put down that which would otherwise be a majority in the colored vote. The ku-klux committee's report is very voluminous, thirteen volumes of it I think, full of evidence pertaining to all those States, including that State. There seemed to be a uniformity of operations, diversified only as particular methods were better adapted in their changes to different parts, but prevalent all over. There cannot be any doubt in my mind about it. I do not know that I shall ever convince the Senator from Alabama upon the subject, but there can be no doubt in my mind of the conclusion to which I have come.

Mr. MORGAN. It is entirely too late for the Senator from Massachusetts to seek to inform the Senate of the United States of the grounds of his charges.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator will excuse me. It is my fault, I suppose, but I do not hear him.

Mr. MORGAN. I say it is entirely too late for the Senator from Massachusetts to inform the Senate of the grounds of his charges, of the facts on which he ventures to predicate those charges against the people of a State; and I regret that it is too late, because I desire to get information from the Senator from Massachusetts in respect of the particular charges that he has to make against the State of Alabama or the people of that State. I wish to know in what particular he means to arraign the people of the State of Alabama. I desire to have what we might call a bill of particulars, so that the Senator might furnish to his own constituents, if not to the people of Alabama, some sufficient reason for accusing them of violating the laws of the United States and the Constitution of the United States in the presence of this Senate, when he knows and I know that the people of my State and the people of his State are continually interchanging the most friendly and amicable relations and are continually employed in intercourse with each other, in peace and amity, without reference to these adventitious charges which the Senator brings against our people, and by which he seems to be disposed, or if not disposed to be determined, to break up the relations between the people of Massachusetts and the people of Alabama.

Now, the Senator will allow me to say to him that the people of his State to-day and the people of my State to-day are engaged in constant intercourse, in constant transportation, profitable to both, not objectionable to either. Your agents come to the South and are welcome there; our merchants go to the North to buy their goods from your manufacturers; and while the whole country is engaged in this interchange of commercial productions and in this traffic between the different sections the Senator is here to proclaim his rage and his mortification because he cannot get up a quarrel between the people of Massachusetts and the people of Alabama.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, the last thing I would do would be to do what the Senator suggests in his last remark. I have no desire for anything but the most friendly relations between the people of Massachusetts and Alabama. The Senator wants to know what authority I have. Has the Senator never heard of the evidence? Has the Senator never read the reports to which I have alluded? Did the Senator know anything about the experience of General Weaver down there last fall? Has the Senator any knowledge of one of his own constituents, Mr. Lowe, what kind of a time he had running for Congress down there, and the accounts of Mr. De La Matyr of the way those opposed to the democracy failed to get a fair vote down there? That is all I desire to state in reference to the interruption.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President——

Mr. DAWES. I will not go any further with this now. I rose simply to call attention to the statements made by the Senator from South Carolina, and I want to say that the Senator himself——

Mr. MORGAN. Now, Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me——

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, in the chair.) Will the Senator from Massachusetts allow the Senator from Alabama to make a remark?

Mr. DAWES. Let me get through with the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. MORGAN. I prefer not, because you turned to my State from the State of South Carolina. So far as the Senator reflected on Alabama——

Mr. DAWES. I cannot go into this, Mr. President.

Mr. MORGAN. But you have gone into it. You cannot get out of the insinuation you have made against the State of Alabama unless you are going to retract what you have said here or withdraw——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts declines to yield.

Mr. MORGAN. So far as Mr. Weaver's reception in Alabama is concerned——

Mr. DAWES. I am waiting for the floor.

Mr. MORGAN. He was as safe as anybody. Hearing from the people of that State——

Mr. DAWES. I am waiting for the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts declines to be interrupted.

Mr. MORGAN. That is the resort of a man who wants honest debate!

Mr. DAWES. I was so struck with the statement of the Senator from South Carolina that I could not forego calling public attention to what he had uttered here in reference to the political condition of the southern country. How large a share he has had in bringing it upon the country and how clearly he has seen if we may assume that he is sincere—and I have no doubt of it—just the trouble they are bringing upon themselves! Here he is acknowledging that negro suffrage is right, but saying that it ought to be accompanied with an educational clause; that the colored men ought to be required to read and write; that the government of the State ought to furnish them schools and require that they should go to those schools, and that everybody in the State should have at the State's expense the means of being qualified as a voter. And yet he sits there and hears his associates on that side of the Chamber day after day arraigning Massachusetts because Massachusetts does what he says the whole South ought to do. Let the whole South follow the preaching of the Senator from South Carolina this day, and practice what the Senator lays down as good political morals, and such a change will come over the governments of those States as has never been seen since the institution of slavery and those who dominated in it have controlled public affairs there. It will be the dawn of a new era. Peace will come when every man, black and white, shall have a vote, shall have the opportunity to be taught its meaning, and shall have, as the Senator from South Carolina says he ought to have, the right to a free deposit of that ballot and an honest count of it. Sir, the Senator from Alabama and all his associates will find this side of the Chamber, and the northern people they represent, hailing that day as a glorious morn of a new era, and they will be welcomed into the ranks of good government, and peace will reign everywhere in this country when the doctrine uttered by the Senator from South Carolina this day shall become the living principle pervading the laws and their administration wherever the flag of this country shall float.

But, sir, there is one thing in preaching and there is quite another in practice. When right within the sound of the Senator's voice, and in spite of these generous utterances of his, the very means we condemn in national elections have been found to play their part in local affairs to the disturbance of the men who invented them, sir, I will not say that the sincerity of the preaching is distrusted, but I will say I am sorry to see here the evidence that the Senator has so little control among his own people.

I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. HAMPTON. I hope the Senator will withdraw that a moment.

Mr. DAWES. I beg pardon; I withdraw the motion for the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. HAMPTON. The Senator has, unwittingly, I have no doubt, done me some injustice.

Mr. DAWES. I did not mean to do any.

Mr. HAMPTON. I did not say that every carpet-bagger was a thief; I gave that as our definition of a carpet-bagger, a man who is a thief there; but that there are men from the North living in my State, and I have no doubt in all the Southern States, of high character and attainments and ability and integrity, I have not denied. I admit it most cordially and most cheerfully, and men who are republicans, men for whom I have great respect, and I have many in my mind now in South Carolina.

In another point the Senator has misunderstood me. I did not say nor did I intimate that the carpet-bag government of South Carolina was overthrown by the use of any fraud. On the contrary, I said that the whole election machinery was in the hands of the republicans, and if there was any fraud they committed it. If there was the possibility of fraud we could not have prevented it under any circumstances. Nor did I make the sweeping admission the Senator puts in my mouth that there was universal fraud there. I admitted that there had been and that there was fraud, and I admit that again; the same fraud that obtains wherever popular elections are held, the same fraud that obtains in all great cities, no doubt in Boston, in New York. In every State as long as you have the freedom of election you must have along with it some amount of fraud, and I only admitted that, that there had been frauds there, but I was trying with many of the people of South Carolina, thousands of the people of South Carolina were trying to make the ballot-box as pure as it could be, and we hoped to succeed.

Mr. CALL. I should like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts a question if he will allow me. The Senator read a letter from Virginia, from some man who expressed some opinion favorable to Caucasian or white supremacy in the government of Virginia. Do I understand the Senator from Massachusetts to say that he is in favor of African supremacy in Massachusetts?

Mr. DAWES. African supremacy!

Mr. CALL. Do you know what that is?

Mr. DAWES. What?

Mr. CALL. You do not know what that is?

Mr. DAWES. I do not know what African supremacy in Massachusetts is; I know what African supremacy would be in Africa.

Mr. CALL. Are you in favor of the government of Massachusetts, the governor, the members of the Legislature, and judges being colored men instead of white men?

Mr. DAWES. I am in favor of every colored man in Massachusetts having exactly the same rights and the same opportunities that every white man has.

Mr. CALL. That does not answer the question. We are all in favor of that.

Mr. DAWES. I am in favor of nobody's being elected governor of Massachusetts whom the majority of our people do not want; and I am in favor of that man, whether he be black or white, being governor of Massachusetts whom the majority do want.

Mr. CALL. You objected to that man's letter upon the ground——

Mr. DAWES. No, I did not object to it; I thought it was a revelation.

Mr. CALL. Do you ever elect any to the Legislature there?

Mr. DAWES. How?

Mr. CALL. We are all in favor of the equality before the law of the colored man.

Mr. DAWES. So is Ensign Stebbins.

Mr. CALL. The Senator objected to a man in Virginia expressing a sentiment which he read here, and he made quite a speech on the subject, and he charged upon the whole southern people a great crime, that they wanted their States under the government, the control, the majority power to be in the hands of the white people. Now, in Virginia there is a large majority of white people. So it is in Florida. There is in Massachusetts, of course, a very small proportion of colored people.

Mr. DAWES. I will tell the Senator what I want, if he has not learned. I want every voter in Massachusetts, and every voter in Florida, and every voter in every State of this Union, to have the right to walk freely and unmolested up to the ballot-box and have his vote and nothing else counted. That is what I want, and I want that vote to tell in the election of the officers, State and national, for which it is cast; and beyond that I do not want anything.

Mr. CALL. I hope the Senator will answer the question I asked him.

Mr. DAWES. I want a black voter in Virginia and a black voter in Massachusetts and a white voter in Massachusetts and a white voter in Virginia to have just exactly the same power and the same opportunity with his neighbor, whether that neighbor be black or white.

Mr. CALL. That is not the question I asked.

Mr. DAWES. If I have the floor, Mr. President, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida has the floor.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I hope the Senator from Massachusetts will not make that motion now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida has the floor.

Mr. CALL. I only wish to make one remark. The honorable Senator from Massachusetts stands here representing a constituency where there is more than one-third of the people who cannot vote. He stands here from a State that never does select a colored man, and that never has had a colored man in Congress nor in the Legislature, if I am correctly informed; but I do not speak of that fact from my own knowledge. I asked him the question. He has made a speech here, and of course as a statesman controlling the affairs of a great Government and a great people what he says is of vast importance; and he denounces the people of Virginia, the white people of Virginia, not because they are not willing to meet the enfranchised African with affection and love and aid to elevate him, but he denounces them before the American people because they ask that the majority of intelligent and capable white people shall govern in that State. Now I say to the Senator he is not sincere in that; Massachusetts does not do it; and I ask him the question, does he want the minority of colored people in Massachusetts to govern the majority there?

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, we elect colored men to the Legislature in Massachusetts.

Mr. CALL. How many?

Mr. DAWES. Just as many as the colored people want.

Mr. CALL. I deny it.

Mr. DAWES. I suppose the Senator knows more about it than anybody else.

Mr. CALL. I do not. I know what your statistics state about it and I know what your court manual states about it. That is all I know.

Mr. DAWES. Now, Mr. President, if the Senator from Delaware——

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I simply wanted to state——

Mr. DAWES. I will not press the motion on the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I merely wish as an act of courtesy to a brother Senator to make the amende honorable as far as it is in my power. I happened to be sitting in my seat when I heard the remark of the Senator from Massachusetts in reply to a communication or telegram that had been read by the Senator from Louisiana. Seeing that the Senator from Massachusetts had evidently understood as applying to himself remarks which in the telegram were applied to another party, I rose for the purpose of relieving his mind from a seeming embarrassment, not for the purpose of interfering at all in the colloquy between him and the Senator from Louisiana. As soon as I had done this, the Senator from Massachusetts, in a manner and in language unbecoming conversation between gentlemen, attempted to rebuke me for impertinence. I say now that I regret it, as I understand from that remark the Senator from Massachusetts does not fully apprehend and appreciate the courtesies of one gentleman to another. I now regret that I made any interference in that respect. I certainly had no desire to interfere with the frequent attacks of the Senator from Massachusetts upon the different States of this Union.

In the practice of my profession I have frequently found that there were witnesses ready on all occasions to come on the stand in every trial as witnesses on the one side or the other to testify. I never sought such witnesses to strengthen any case which I had in hand; I never regretted their appearance against me, because I knew full well that the juries before which I tried my causes would give proper weight to the testimony of a witness who was always ready to testify in every case as of his own knowledge. Such witnesses have never had any weight in the courts of my State, and I apprehend that the continued assaults of the Senator from Massachusetts upon the sister States of this Republic will fall harmless and to the ground.

Now, sir, I simply rose to say that I shall not hereafter, whatever the mistake the Senator from Massachusetts may labor under, after the impertinent reply that he made, discourteous as I regard it, interfere, but suffer him to remain under the delusions of his own imagination.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, so far as the Senator's remarks are personal to myself, I desire to state that I ask his pardon. I made a very curt reply to him which I was sorry for the moment I made it, and which I do not think I ought to have made, and I am very glad that the Senator calls my attention to it, for it had passed out of my mind in the heat of debate.

In the heat of debate I made a remark which I regret. So far as the Senator alludes to my attacks on the States represented on the other side, I have nothing to say; the Senator must judge of that for himself. But I desire to maintain the dignity and courtesy of the Senate, and whenever I have transgressed it in the heat of debate I am very glad to make all the amende in my power. Whatever further amende it may be in my power to make I do not know. I ask the Senator's pardon for a remark which seemed unkind and not altogether proper.

Now, I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at five o'clock and forty-three minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

FRIDAY, April 22, 1881.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. BURNSIDE, it was Ordered, That Lieutenant-Colonel Charles McDougall have leave to withdraw his petition and papers from the files of the Senate.

OFFICERS OF THE SENATE.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business of yesterday, being the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] providing for the election of certain officers of the Senate, the pending question being on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] to postpone the resolution indefinitely, on which motion the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move that the Senate proceed now to the consideration of executive business; and on that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ALLISON, (when his name was called.) For this day I am paired with the Senator from West Virginia, [Mr. DAVIS.]

Mr. BURNSIDE, (when Mr. ANTHONY's name was called.) My colleague [Mr. ANTHONY] is paired with the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. HILL.] If my colleague were here, he would vote "nay."

Mr. CONGER, (when Mr. FERRY's name was called.) My colleague [Mr. FERRY] is paired, as I understand, with the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. SAULSBURY.]

Mr. HARRIS, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from New York, [Mr. CONKLING.] If he were here, I should vote "yea."

Mr. HILL, of Georgia, (when his name was called.) I am paired on this question with the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. ANTHONY.] If he were here, I should vote "yea."

Mr. INGALLS, (when his name was called.) I am paired on this vote with the Senator from Texas, [Mr. COKE.] If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. MILLER, (when Mr. KELLOGG's name was called.) I desire to announce for to-day that the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. KELLOGG] is paired with the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. VANCE.]

Mr. MCPHERSON, (when his name was called.) I desire to state for the day that I am paired with my colleague, [Mr. SEWELL.]

Mr. MILLER, (when his name was called.) I am paired for the day with the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DAVIS.]

Mr. PLATT, of New York, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. LAMAR.] If he were here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. RANSOM, (when his name was called.) I do not see the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] present, and I withhold my vote.

Mr. SAUNDERS, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. WILLIAMS.] If he were here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, (when Mr. SAWYER's name was called.) My colleague [Mr. SAWYER] is paired with the Senator from West Virginia, [Mr. CAMDEN.]

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. BURNSIDE, (after having voted in the negative.) I desire to withdraw my vote. I am paired with the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. GORMAN.] It escaped my mind.

Mr. COCKRELL. I desire to say for the day that I am paired with the Senator from Maine, [Mr. FRYE.] Were he here, he would vote "nay" and I should vote "yea."

Mr. CAMDEN. I am paired with the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. SAWYER.]

Mr. FERRY. I am paired with the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. SAULSBURY.] Were he here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. BLAIR. I wish to announce the pair of my colleague [Mr. ROLLINS] with the Senator from Florida, [Mr. JONES.]

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I am paired with the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. ROLLINS.] If he were here, I should vote "yea."

Mr. INGALLS. My colleague [Mr. PLUMB] is paired with the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. VEST.]

Mr. BECK. I believe the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. SAUNDERS] has announced that my colleague [Mr. WILLIAMS] is paired with him. I will not announce it any more to-day.

Mr. FERRY. In my pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] I reserved the right of voting if it was necessary to make a quorum. I find there is not a quorum voting now, and therefore I vote "nay," simply to complete the quorum, if possible.

Mr. PLATT, of New York. I am paired, but in order to make a quorum I shall vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. ALLISON. I am also paired with permission to vote in order to make a quorum, as I understand my pair. Therefore I vote "nay."

Mr. MILLER. I am paired, but can vote to make a quorum. I vote "nay."

Mr. HARRIS. I simply want to know why the vote is not announced.

Mr. BLAIR. There was no quorum.

Mr. COCKRELL. That does not prevent the announcement.

Mr. HARRIS. The rule provides that the result shall be announced when the roll-call is completed.

The result was announced—yeas 17, nays 22; as follows:

So the motion to lay the resolution on the table was not agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, until a very short time ago it was not my purpose to contribute anything to this debate, but the baseless charge of a corrupt bargain, so flippantly made, implies that the republican Senators must be one of the parties to that bargain. I should be sorry to know that even any democratic Senator had so poor an opinion of me that a denial of this charge was necessary; but I shall say that so far as the vote of the Senator from Virginia was concerned, I understood in advance that it would be cast on our side without any conditions whatever. Whoever may believe otherwise of me or of my associates, I can only pity their credulity and scorn their measure of justice to political opponents.

As for myself I should have been indifferent as to whether the officers of the Senate were to be democratic or republican, if we had been asked as a matter of grace to retain the present incumbents until December next; but the principle now sought to be maintained and to which there is grave objection is, that they shall be retained against the will of the Senate and at all hazards, and that a democratic minority may, whenever it chooses to do so, by diligent abuse of the rules of this body, arrest the action of the Senate upon any question where the votes of that minority, if given and counted against it, would be wholly ineffectual, save to indicate the measure of their disapprobation. It is a practical suspension of the functions of the Senate at the will of any number of democratic Senators which may amount to not less than eight, that being one-fifth of a quorum, and the number required to call the yeas and nays. It is this eight-handed tyranny to which the Senate is called upon to surrender. It appears to me to be no less than a rank usurpation of the rights, privileges, and power of the Senate, and the doctrine, though now, as I think, inconsiderately supported by many eminent gentlemen of the opposition in rather violent if not intemperate speeches, will ultimately be crushed by the upper and nether millstones of the public judgment. It is fraught with danger to our institutions, and therefore it will not be tolerated by the people. The decision of the several States, from which there is no appeal, has reduced the democratic party from its recent position of the stronger party in the Senate to that of the weaker party, and a true adherence to the fundamental principles of democracy, as well as of republicanism, requires an honest, cheerful, and prompt acquiescence.

Minorities under our constitutional forms of government, being outnumbered and lawfully defeated, must submit, or republican government is a failure. Any other device or expedient, anything less, must degrade the great American Republic to the level of less advanced peoples where revolutions, conspiracies, and insurrections have become almost periodic and chronic. Here the minority has its full rights, with its voting power only limited by actual numbers, its copiousness in debate unrestricted; but it would be preposterous, if it were not willfully and flagrantly wrong, for such a minority to insist upon the mastery, and say to the Senate, you may do this, but you shall not do that. What would Madison, or any of the statesmen in the early days of the Republic, say to the attitude of the present democratic filibusters of the Senate? He and they would advise them that their action is indefensible, and that, if they hoped ever to be in any better position than that of the minority which they now hold, they would do better not to stamp upon their historical record in large type an example so reprehensible—possibly to return to plague the inventors, if republicans should ever be equally reckless of their constitutional duty.

It is in vain to make the pretense that the democratic party of the Senate is not now in an impracticable and hopeless minority; and the hollowness of such a pretense is disclosed by the want of courage so long and repeatedly exhibited in the refusal to solve the question by a square and direct vote of the Senate.

If there has been introduced into this debate something of bitterness and acrimony, matters which would better perhaps become other places than the Senate, the RECORD, I think, will show that the opposition side of the Senate are responsible for the introduction of that style of debate. The party which gives blows must expect to receive some in return. Something must be pardoned to the law of retaliation, which human nature is ever weak to resist.

The political Brahmins of the democracy who hold all those who disagree with them as a lower caste, as much as they do those of a different color, and who claim a proprietary right to the "solid South," and to its 138 democratic electoral votes, while recklessly assailing the republican party, have yet not infrequently admitted the unexampled prosperity of the country, though it has secured that prosperity for more than twenty years while so largely under republican rule. Another hopeful sign is to be seen in the sensitiveness of democratic Senators as to democratic State repudiation, and their anxiety to apologize for and to diminish its apparent extent and amount. Most hopeful of all is the assertion of some southern Senators, which, if unfounded, is still that tribute which hypocrisy is said to pay to virtue, that nowhere else but in the South is there a free vote and a fair count, and then straightway do they thank God that they are not like other men, much less like those of Massachusetts or even of Rhode Island. They are, as they declare, the true friends of the colored race, although they deluged their land in blood to keep that race and their descendants forever in bondage; and we are further notified that the party which proclaimed freedom and citizenship throughout the land no longer possesses the confidence of that enfranchised colored phalanx which is to add forty votes in Congress to the "solid South." Democratic Senators would seem just now to have stolen republican clothes, and I hope they will not doff the garments when they return home.

We do not seek to diminish the lawful political power of any section of the country, but we do say, when you have all that in its fullest measure, we will not consent to have it transcended in any quarter, here or elsewhere, by counting a minority as more potential than the majority.

Mr. President, I should not have added anything to the length of this debate if it had not been for the introduction of what appears to me a new feature in the debates and usages of the Senate, and I refer to the combined attack of democratic Senators upon a single Senator who has just taken his seat in this body. If that Senator comes here with any less title to exercise his free-will, with any less of absolute personal independence, or with less right to be guided in all of his political and official actions by his own judgment and conscience, than any other Senator, I must confess that I have been unable to comprehend wherein his inferiority is to be found. And yet Senators come here daily with all their partisan artillery and small-arms, loaded to the muzzle with invectives and innuendoes, which are discharged with great noise at the devoted head of the new Senator from Virginia, and all because that Senator, elected in opposition to the democratic party and without its help, has not felt it to be his duty to supply one vote, that paramount need of the democratic party of the Senate at the present moment, with which to maintain its control of the offices of the Senate.

I am not about to make any defense of the Senator from Virginia; he needs none; and if he ever does need any he seems quite able to defend himself, although it does not appear to me quite chivalrous on the part of thirty-seven honorable Senators to strike all together at one of our fellow-members; but I must protest against the right of one Senator, or of any number of Senators, to call any other Senator to account for the votes he may choose to give here upon any question. Whatever may have been done elsewhere to cause the coinage of that brutal word, bulldozing—and I ask pardon for using it—Senators are not likely to be bulldozed. Their votes will be free, and they must be fairly counted.

One Senator, with his State behind him as his responsible backer, is the peer of any other Senator, whether choosing to vote with the party of the administration, or with the opposition, or to oscillate in the air as an independent. The bigotry and superstition of the broad-brim democracy in adhering to the old clothes that covered the nakedness of their party in ages gone by, such as the resolutions of 1798, the gun-boat navy, vetoes of internal improvement, and the secession mania and slavery propagandism of Calhoun, must give way to principles and policies more in harmony with the progress of the age, and no proscription or social ostracism, and no hue and cry to shoot down the deserters who leap out of the ruts of the democratic party, will long hinder earnest and thoughtful men,—who are turning their attention to the development of the great material interests of the country and the moral and intellectual elevation of the people in every part of the land,—from leaving that party whose success paralyzes enterprise and inspires business men with dread, whose guiding principle appears to be opposition to the measures of some other party, and whose rallying political watchword continues to be, to the victors belong the spoils.

Let me say that the unprovoked and fierce warfare upon the new Senator from Virginia, intended to destroy him, will in my opinion have directly the contrary effect. The American people love fair play, and they will not suffer any one to be overwhelmed by mere clamor. Those who come here renouncing Bourbonism will be welcomed whether they come from the Old Dominion of the New or the Old World. In saying this I do not propose to connect myself with either of the anti-debt-paying parties of Virginia. Neither of them, as I think, are up to the standard of right, and West Virginia is quite as much a delinquent as the "mother of States." The honor of States is a State right. Let them guard it. The political and personal grievance is that, whereas the Senator from Virginia voted for Hancock, and was once a democrat, he is so no longer. If he really belonged to their household of faith, why did they move heaven and earth, to say nothing about a nameless place, to defeat him when he was a candidate for Senator? Mr. President, nobody knew better than the so-called Bourbon democracy (and I copy words best known in Virginia) that the Senator from Virginia "went out from them because he was not of them." Ask Randall or Hewitt. Ask Barnum, to whom the Senator from Virginia might well have said:

> "Fair sir, you spit on me on Wednesday last;
> You spurn'd me such a day; another time
> You call'd me—dog; and for these courtesies
> I'll lend you"—nothing!

But in the present case suppose for a moment that the Senator from Virginia had changed his party relations, even unexpectedly changed them, would that be any crime? Such examples are very numerous among members of all parties. Among others, Bell, of Tennessee; Sumner and Banks, of Massachusetts, and Dixon, of Connecticut.

The democratic party have had some experience in trying the lash over the backs of some of their associates for presuming to differ upon any points in their constantly shifting quadrennial platforms, but that experience does not appear to have taught them forbearance or greater wisdom.

Henry A. Wise, a name as much distinguished as any other in Virginia within the last half century, was elected to the House of Representatives in 1833 as a Jackson democrat, and yet from the outset he opposed the leading measures of President Jackson; and, while he served until 1844, he was for the last six or seven years one of the brightest ornaments of the whig party. Then, joining the Tyler guard, of which Caleb Cushing was one, he relapsed, becoming a "Tippecanoe and Tyler too" sort of a democrat, and was sent by President Tyler as minister to Brazil. Did anybody charge that a bargain had been made with Mr. Wise? Nevertheless the question of what party he would help or hinder from the very beginning to the end was as much the subject of democratic speculation and anxiety as has been that of the junior Senator from Virginia. The offense of Mr. Wise did not prove unpardonable, for the democrats afterward made him governor; and I have no doubt they would do equally well by Senator MAHONE to-morrow if he would only consent.

John P. Hale was elected as a democrat from New Hampshire to the Twenty-eighth Congress and renominated for the Twenty-ninth, but his views concerning the annexation of Texas not being on the key-note of the democratic leaders, another candidate was presented and there was no choice. The Legislature of the State soon after, or in 1846, elected Mr. Hale to the Senate, where he served many years, a constant thorn to those who had attempted to consign him to Coventry. The democratic party was never supposed to have added much to its political capital by its ostracism and warfare upon Mr. Hale. It remains to be seen how much they will gain by abuse of those who will not acknowledge perpetual allegiance to its chieftains.

Calhoun is another conspicuous example among American statesmen of those who have found "reasons as plenty as blackberries" for leaving one party and joining another. Mr. Calhoun entered the House of Representatives in 1811, and next to Henry Clay was the leader of the war party in 1812. He was the author of the protective tariff of 1816, and became Secretary of War under President Monroe, serving in the same Cabinet with John Quincy Adams. He was elected Vice-President, serving during the term of President Adams, from 1825 to 1829. But he then left Clay and Adams and joined his political fortunes to those of General Jackson, and was again elected Vice-President, serving until he quarreled with Jackson, and resigned in 1832. In 1829 he persuaded the Legislature of South Carolina to pass the historically notorious resolution "that any State in the Union might annul an act of the Federal Government." Thereupon General Jackson used such energetic and effectual measures to nullify South Carolina nullification that Mr. Calhoun left the Jacksonian democracy, resigned the Vice-Presidency, and having been elected to the Senate, acted with the opposition through the remainder of the first and through all of the second term of General Jackson. He introduced the bill for the recharter of the United States Bank in 1816, and again in 1834 a bill to extend the charter for twelve years, but in 1837 he appeared as the adversary of the bank; and about this time, having reached the conclusion that a victory on the part of the whigs would "not inure to the benefit" of the South, he once more changed his party relations by working harmoniously with the democratic party. Often stripped of some public influence, he yet never failed, turn which way he would, to secure the devotion of his own State to his political fortunes. Time has annihilated his later theories, but will never wholly destroy his greatness, for he was intellectually a tower of strength to whatever party that gained his alliance.

John Quincy Adams was elected as a federalist to the United States Senate from Massachusetts, and served from 1803 until 1808, when he was defeated and resigned, but he turned out to be so much of a democrat as to be appointed by a democratic administration as minister to Russia, and held that position from 1809 until 1814, and then became a member of the Cabinet, along with Mr. Calhoun, under Mr. Monroe from 1817 to 1825. After being President, he was elected in 1833 to the House of Representatives as a whig. In these changes it has never been imputed to him that he brought disgrace upon his State. The only charge of bargain ever made was touching his appointment of Henry Clay as Secretary of State, and the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] knows that charge was most foul and should have been repented of in dust and ashes, for the Senator from Kentucky was a devoted follower like myself of Henry Clay long after that date. Let me tell the Senator from Kentucky that the embryo charges made by those who are "willing to wound, yet afraid to strike" the Senator from Virginia, and which are to come forth full-fledged on the hustings in Virginia, are in my judgment as unfounded and calumnious as those which excited the indignation of the Senator from Kentucky, and mine, when made against Henry Clay.

Hannibal Hamlin was a democratic Representative from Maine in the Twenty-eighth and Twenty-ninth Congresses, and elected to the Senate in 1848 and re-elected in 1851 as a democrat. Before his term expired he renounced (June 12, 1856,) all adherence to the democratic party, and ever since has been a leading member of the republican party; but no man has ever left the Senate with more of the cordial respect and esteem of his fellow-Senators of all parties than Senator Hamlin possessed when he bid adieu to the Senate on the 4th of March last.

Like Mr. Burke, when he became alienated from his constituents at Bristol by his advocacy of the claims of the Roman Catholics, Mr. Hamlin was a statesman ready to proclaim and maintain the doctrine of the independence of parliamentary representatives, or that they were not mere machines to vote for measures approved by their constituencies simply and alone for that reason, but were men and thinkers chosen by them to calmly consider and legislate for the good of the Commonwealth. The State of Maine followed the teachings of Mr. Hamlin as steadily as South Carolina followed Mr. Calhoun.

Having referred to Mr. Burke let me add that he separated himself in 1791 from Mr. Fox and the whig party of Great Britain on the question of the French revolution, and was rewarded by his sovereign with various pensions amounting to nearly twenty thousand dollars per annum; but did any one ever suggest that there was a bargain and that Burke, the brightest intellect of his age, had been bought?

The republican party itself has had some of its members after long service here fall from grace, as was proved by their action against us, but they were never dealt with as outlaws, and they retained all the rights and received all the courtesies due to Senators. It may be added that we never felt that the States which they represented were so weak and tottering in the republican faith as Virginia in the eyes of some Senators appears to be in the democratic faith, or that they were likely to be lost in consequence, unless every republican Senator gave all his time and attention to their rescue. Mr. Doolittle, elected as a republican from Wisconsin, and in 1863 re-elected as such, was found long before his term expired doing the tough work of the democratic party, and has been doing it I suppose ever since.

Another eminent gentleman, Mr. Trumbull, was elected to Congress as a democrat, and the same year, 1855, he was elected to the Senate, but he voted steadily with the republicans and was twice re-elected as a republican. Yet before the expiration of his third term his democratic proclivities rose to the surface and became so prominent that his friends refused to be comforted because he was not selected as the democratic candidate for the Presidency in 1872 or in 1876. No one charges that the Illinois Senator joined the democratic party with the promise of reward, and yet presidential prizes have often tempted the best of men.

Neither of the Senators mentioned were tabooed because they had left the republicans, nor were they refused pairs because they had not publicly declared whether they were democrats or republicans.

Horace Greeley had but few points of agreement with the democratic party, and still that party nominated and accepted him with great enthusiasm in 1872 as their candidate for the Presidency, in order to break down the republican party, notwithstanding Mr. Greeley was in the habit of declaring that "while he would not say every democrat was a horse-thief, it was still true that every horse-thief was a democrat." Even after this they loved Horace as a man and a brother.

The perpetuity of the solid South will not be secured by hunting down the Senator from Virginia, but the stones which are being hurled in that direction will fall harmless at his feet and form a monumental pile upon which he will stand with greater dignity and with greater power to proclaim the gospel of independence, a free ballot and a fair count—a gospel akin to that first announced by Jefferson in the immortal Declaration of Independence, "that all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness." Instead of making him a pariah among his own people, his mission will have been greatly magnified by the battalions his political enemies have felt it to be necessary to array against him, and in Virginia he is henceforth most likely fated to be a trusted and heroic leader.

I have endeavored frankly to give my opinion mainly on two points. First, upon the attitude of the democratic Senators as obstructionists in preventing the free and lawful action of the Senate, and in this attitude there can be no doubt they are clearly and wholly wrong. And, second, upon the character of the personal warfare upon a member of this body, claiming as I do the right of every Senator to control his own vote, and that any criticism upon the motives governing that vote is inexcusable. I have regretted to see what appears to me a lack of Senatorial courtesy, so much esteemed here, where no man ever has been or ever can be disgraced for his personal independence or for courage to act up to his real convictions.

[A message in writing was received from the President of the United States by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries.]

Mr. BECK. While I have listened carefully to the speech just made by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] I did not quite catch it all. There are some ideas in it that I like. He affirmed the right of each Senator to vote as he pleases and not to be called to account for any vote he may see fit to give; and I concur in his further statement that there can be no bulldozing in this Senate, as each Senator is the peer of every other and is responsible to his constituents for whatever he may see fit to do. All that class of ideas which I thought I heard announced with emphasis meet my unqualified approval; and it ill becomes gentlemen on the other side who are making these admissions to rise here day after day and charge us with being guilty of revolution, treason, and everything that is vile because we are casting our votes in strict accordance with the rules of the Senate, and under those rules for what we think will redound to the best interests of the country.

There has not been a speech made on the other side by any distinguished gentleman that has not ding-donged into the ears of the country that we are guilty of all sorts of wrong and outrages by steadily refusing to do what you want us to do. It seems to me that the continued repetition of these charges will not strengthen them before the country, nor will they tend to convince or to convert us. Our constituents thoroughly understand that we think we have good reasons for not following the dictation of your caucus by a disorganization of the Senate and reorganizing it to suit you, but that we are right in demanding that you shall proceed with the business of the Senate, according to the call of the President. He brought us here to consider such communications relative to the public interest as he might see fit to send to us; they come to us every day; one was laid on our table this morning; over three hundred nominations and four or five treaties are pending before us, and you say, forsooth, that because you cannot make us do what you want, and make us disorganize the Senate and then reorganize it to suit your purposes, you will not do anything but scold and abuse us. I am not going to make any attack upon the motives of Senators; I shall attend to these things when I go before my own constituents or the people elsewhere; nor do I intend to say anything that may get me into a personal controversy on this floor. When the distinguished statesman and soldier from Rhode Island [Mr. BURNSIDE] marched to the front the other day and announced that statements or intimations which had been made must stop, that they were false, false, false, I knew it was time to be very careful.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator will allow me to ask him a question in the line of parliamentary inquiry not for the purpose of controversy.

Mr. BECK. Very well.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will ask the Senator whether he thinks any party is justified in resorting to dilatory proceedings in the ordinary course of legislative business merely to defeat a measure or to prevent the majority from passing a measure, an ordinary bill for instance?

Mr. BECK. I will answer the Senator. If any party believe—and I am not now going to express my belief as to the pending proposition—that a great wrong is to be perpetrated or that the course the other party desire them to pursue is detrimental to the public good, then they have a right to resort to dilatory motions. I resorted to them in the House of Representatives, I remember, once for nearly forty-eight hours to prevent the passage of the force bill. I thought that course was right because I was seeking to prevent the passage of what I regarded as a bad and dangerous law. Now what our motives for resorting to dilatory motions, if you call them dilatory motions at the present time, are, is for ourselves. We are responsible only to our constituents.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will ask another question. Then the Senator, I understand, admits that ordinarily it would not be right to resort to dilatory motions by a minority, but that for extraordinary reasons, as in the case of the force bill——

Mr. BECK. I will answer in this way: whether it is right or wrong is for the Senator himself who casts his vote to determine; and if he is within the rules, it is neither right nor courteous, in my judgment, for Senators on the other side to say that he is seeking to revolutionize the Government or that he is guilty of treason for voting as the rules of the Senate allow him to vote, or for making propositions authorized by the rules.

Mr. SHERMAN. One more question. I should like to ask the Senator whether he does not know as a matter of parliamentary law that it is within the power of any fifteen Senators here to prevent the passage of any bill, any measure that may be deemed proper to be passed by the majority?

Mr. BECK. In answer to that I would say that I do know that it is within the power of any eight Senators when only a quorum is present, the one-fifth of a quorum, one-fifth of the members present by calling the yeas and nays and resorting to dilatory motions, to prevent the passage of any measure; and we have avowed, for good or bad reasons, that is our business, that we intend to prevent you from disorganizing the Senate and reorganizing it as your caucus has ordered; if we are wrong in so doing we are responsible for that wrong. Is that a satisfactory answer?

Mr. SHERMAN. Just one more question, and I am done.

Mr. BECK. Let me answer more fully, if the Senator pleases. It is because I know that you cannot consummate your purposes without our aid, and because I know the distinguished Senator from Ohio knows that; and as we have avowed it, and taken the responsibility of it, that I have been amazed at the course of gentlemen on the other side who are responsible for the legislation of the country, whose President has sent us over three hundred nominations, who says that he cannot see to it that the laws are faithfully executed unless he is allowed to have his nominations confirmed. The fact that gentlemen on the other side do not go into executive session and consider that business amazes us. They will not consider these nominations; they block the wheels of government and prevent the President from seeing that the laws are properly executed. This, I repeat, is amazing to me and, I hope I may be pardoned for saying, seems silly in the extreme.

I have seen spoilt children refuse to eat bread and butter because they could not get sugar on it; I have seen them whine and cry over it and declare they would never eat the bread and butter, that they would starve first. You gentlemen know the nominations are all of your own party friends; all the places belong to you; every appointment that is made is made perhaps at the suggestion of the Senator from Ohio or other Senators on that side. No democrat is appointed. None so far as I know has been recommended by any of us. Why is it that you will not accomplish all that you need substantially, get as I said all the bread and butter—for it is all yours, none of it is ours—why is it that you persist in behaving, if I may be allowed to say it, like spoiled children and will not take the substantial good as freely offered unless you can get sugar and all?

Mr. SHERMAN. Now I want to ask another question. I have asked two, and I have got answers. I wish to see if I understand the answers. I asked the Senator from Kentucky whether he thought it was right to resort to dilatory motions by a minority on an ordinary matter of legislation, and he said no.

Mr. BECK. I have not said no; I beg pardon.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let me go on. He says no; that the minority have the power to determine whether the case is extraordinary. Then I ask him whether a minority of fifteen may not in this way stop the wheels of government and prevent the passage of any measure? He says yes, and a minority of eight might do it, but they must determine the occasion for it. Now, let me ask him the other question whether when a minority does make the determination to take this course that is not revolutionary, tending to revolution, and if carried out compels the majority to abandon its purpose to pass a law or do whatever it desires to do.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, I do not regard anything as revolutionary that is done within the rules of the Senate. Doing nothing only leaves things as they are. If a Senator, or a number of Senators, so trifle with their constituents and with the general legislation of the country as to show that they intend to block the wheels of government, or intend to consummate any fraud, or to do any corrupt act, or have any bad motive in their conduct, then we assume that their constituents have sense enough to keep them at home and send better men to fill their places. If the Senator from Ohio thinks that our conduct in this regard is of such a character as that, he and his party will take great pains to expose our bad conduct to our constituents, and either have men of his party sent to fill the places we now occupy, or induce our constituents to send better men of our party to fill our places. We have taken the responsibility of this; we avow it. No harm can come from non-action. We have said to you from the beginning, we will proceed to the consideration of executive business; we will enable the President to see that the laws are faithfully executed; we will fill your Supreme and circuit courts, indeed all the great offices, with your party friends. While in power under the last administration or under this, although there was hardly a man of our party that I know of who sought to obtain office under either of them, we have never sought to block the wheels of government, we never sought to delay or embarrass the President in filling any of his appointments. All the embarrassment that he has had has been from his own party friends. Our past conduct is the highest evidence that we intend nothing revolutionary or dangerous in our present action, and it is absurd to charge that we do.

We have never cared about your personal or political quarrels and squabbles among yourselves; we have never inquired whether the appointment of one man or another would aid this particular statesman or politician, call him what you will, or that particular politician. We have cared nothing about the personal wranglings of the Senators on the other side. We have pursued the policy that Mr. Jefferson said should alone be pursued, to simply ask the question, is the man whom the President has nominated honest, is he faithful, is he capable; and if so we have sustained the republican President. We may have differed with him, of course, and that we propose to do whenever he sends us men who lack the qualities we demand in public officials.

All we have been asking you to do is to sustain the President you yourselves elected, to sustain the administration for which you are responsible. In all matters necessary to carry on the Government, all that the President has called us together for, all that made this executive session necessary or possible, you have found us in the forefront ready to stand by you in everything, and we will to the end. But you deliberately abandon that duty and try to do what you admit never was done before from the foundation of the Government to the present time, except in a solitary instance in 1853 when it was done to get clear of an officer against whom charges were made. As the honorable Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] well knows, for he was a member of that remarkable Congress in 1861, when men were there who were suspected of disloyalty and charged with it, even they were allowed to remain, and the officers of the Senate during all that executive session were retained because the traditions of the Government were against their removal in executive session, and they remained until the session was called in July.

When you ask us to abandon all these traditions, to leave all the public business untouched, to disregard the pending treaties, to pay no attention to public interests or to allow the offices to be filled that are necessary to carry on the Government, we for reasons satisfactory to ourselves decline to follow you; and we refuse to obey the orders your caucus have put upon you, for many of you do not like this work very much yourselves, in my opinion. There ought to be a becoming modesty, let me suggest to Senators on the other side. As I said a little while ago, I am going to be very careful. After what I heard the other day from the Senator from Rhode Island, I cannot afford to get into a fight, and if I did, and should happen to shoot one of the gentlemen on the other side, I would be guilty of high treason by breaking up the constitutional majority of the Senate. Then you would all have to give up your committee-rooms and clerks, and abandon your resolutions. I would be worse than Benedict Arnold or Aaron Burr or any other sinner in the estimation of these gentlemen after they had lost all they filibustered so long and vigorously to obtain. I am not going to do it, and I hope no gentleman on this side will attempt it; but it would seem to me that when the Senate is equally divided, when you know that if every man you have was present you have only thirty-eight, while thirty-nine is a quorum of the Senate, there can of course be no constitutional majority that is not a constitutional quorum, it is absurd to say that there can, you know that without our positive help and vote you cannot carry out or pass these resolutions at all; and when you know, furthermore, as the Senator from Ohio has just said——

Mr. HOAR. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. BECK. I would rather not now.

Mr. HOAR. On this point?

Mr. BECK. The Senator from Ohio is dealing with me now and I am trying to convert him if I can. He is worth converting. I cannot convert the Senator from Massachusetts, he knows that; but there is hope for the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator declines——

Mr. BECK. I cannot convert you, but I mean to be perfectly respectful. I beg the Senator's pardon and I will answer him any question he may ask if I can.

Mr. HOAR. I do not propose to have any question of courtesy with the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BECK. Not at all, and I yield.

Mr. HOAR. I understand that the question whether I am courteous to any Senator depends entirely on the respect I have for my own character and I suppose that is the understanding of the Senator from Kentucky. I do not desire to be discourteous to him.

Mr. BECK. I know that.

Mr. HOAR. I propose courteously to ask leave to put a question. The Senator says that he will not aid in doing this, that, or the other. Does the Senator understand that it is aiding to do an act against which he votes, against which he speaks, which he opposes by all the methods prescribed in the Constitution? We do not ask the Senator to aid us to elect Mr. A B or Mr. C D. We only ask that when the Senate, as the Constitution prescribes, voting either by a majority of Senators or by an equal number with the Vice-President, vote that that business shall be done, he shall not keep moving to adjourn and calling the yeas and nays and taking up the time preventing the Senate's action in expressing its opinion and will. Now the question which I desire to ask the Senator is indicated by the point: Does he think he and his associates corrrectly use the phrase "aiding in doing an act" when of course if they vote upon my colleague's resolution they will vote against it, and if they speak on my colleague's resolution they will speak against it?

Mr. BECK. We have endeavored to meet the proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts by other parliamentary propositions. The Chair has decided that each proposition we have made was in order, and we expect to make no propositions that are not in order. If they are in order they are of equal dignity with the proposition made by the Senator from Massachusetts, and have precedence under the rules over the proposition that he makes. Having precedence over his proposition and we having seen fit to make them, we certainly cannot be guilty of revolution or treason or anything else by antagonizing that proposition with other proper parliamentary propositions, as we have done and propose to continue to do.

But the other view that I was taking in answering the Senator from Ohio was, that if we were to behave as badly as it was admitted in the closing hours or days of the last session of Congress the distinguished gentlemen on the other side behaved when they folded their arms and refused to vote at all, which they claimed was their constitutional right, and they did not seem to think they were guilty of either revolution or treason, although Congress was expiring and all the nominations would fail forever so far as that Congress was concerned—if we were to pursue that course, which we have not pursued, if we were to follow that example, then your thirty-eight, as I was endeavoring to show, would not be a constitutional quorum, and the Vice-President not being a Senator could not help you, and without a constitutional quorum there could be no constitutional majority. I did not say we were going to pursue that course, but we have the same power to do it that gentlemen on the other side had at the close of the last session of Congress.

Mr. BLAIR. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. BECK. If you will allow me to make a remark first I will then yield.

Mr. BLAIR. It is a question for information.

Mr. BECK. I will answer the question of the Senator from New Hampshire, and before any other Senator rises I will announce in advance that I shall not answer any other Senator, because I expected to have taken my seat long ago. I did not rise to make a speech, only to protest against this continual scolding. The Senator from Ohio in a very good-natured way asked me certain questions, which I have endeavored to answer as fairly as I knew how. Now I will answer your question.

Mr. BLAIR. Mine is rather one in reference to the proper construction of the rules than anything else, and I ask it of the Senator from Kentucky, as an old parliamentarian, as I would ask it of a Senator from my own side of the House if one were now speaking. It seems to be assumed in the remarks of the honorable Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] and in the remarks of various other Senators, that the operations of the Government, so far as the progress of business in the Senate is concerned, are at the mercy of one-fifth of the number of Senators present, there being a quorum present; and therefore there being only a quorum, they are at the mercy of a minority of eight, who can call the yeas and nays. The point which I raise and in regard to which I ask information is this: Whether really upon the principle asserted by the Senators upon the other side, and in conformity to it, in the transaction of public business here now, the Senate is not at the mercy of any single member, any one member who chooses to alternate with these dilatory motions and to ask a vote? I understand that any single member has a right to make a dilatory motion, (that we see illustrated every day,) and the vote is taken in accordance with his motion. It takes one-fifth of the number present to require the yeas and nays; but the alternation of motions and taking the result by a division or by a viva voce vote vests in each individual by virtue of his membership of the Senate. It is perfectly plain, if my impression is correct, and I ask the honorable Senator for his upon that subject, that, upon the theory under which the minority are acting at the present time, a minority of one can indefinitely, can forever, destroy the power of the Senate to transact business. The alternation would come with a little more frequency; that is all the difference there would be between a case where a single individual insists upon making these motions and taking a viva voce vote or a vote by a division and where the voting is done by yeas and nays. I ask the Senator, then, if it is not as possible under the rules for one man to clog the wheels of government and to destroy the existence of this nation under its present Constitution, as much under the power of one individual to do it as of one-fifth of a quorum, or of any number greater or less than a quorum; and if he feels justified in doing it, cannot that one man break up the Government?

Mr. BECK. I think the Senator will find when he looks at the RECORD that he has made nearly as long a speech as I have. Really I hardly know how to answer his question except to say that whenever a quorum is not present no business can be transacted, and the only way to develop a quorum, if the Presiding Officer should declare that a majority had carried a motion, would be by calling the yeas and nays. It takes one-fifth of those present to call the yeas and nays; but if there is no quorum voting and one man objects to the matter being declared carried because there is no quorum, and the Presiding Officer declares there is no quorum voting, that one man can do just as well as the one-fifth of the members present.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator, I see, does not understand my question. I made it perhaps so long as to confuse him.

Mr. BECK. I confess that is true.

Mr. BLAIR. The question is whether one single man who may conceive it to be his duty cannot alternate these dilatory motions perpetually, and so destroy the Government, the vote not being taken by yeas and nays, but viva voce?

Mr. BECK. I do not suppose that is possible, and if it is so it is one of the improbable things that never happens. But there is this about it: whatever rights any Senator has under the rules it can neither be treasonable nor revolutionary to exercise those rights. Therefore, until the rules are changed——

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator will bear me out, I have not charged anything like treason or revolution in the conduct of Senators on the other side.

Mr. BECK. I am glad to hear that.

Mr. BLAIR. I think the question whether conduct is treasonable or revolutionary depends upon the character of the measure which they advocate or oppose, the motive with which they do it, and the probable consequences.

Mr. BECK. That is precisely right.

Mr. BLAIR. That is my view in regard to it, although I am sorry to disagree with abler men than myself upon my own side of the Chamber. But conceiving it to be his duty to do precisely what the entire minority are doing at present, cannot one single man, by alternating these dilatory motions and asking for a viva voce vote, absolutely prevent any business whatever from being transacted by the Senate for all time to come, provided he lives so long and remains a member?

Mr. BECK. Perhaps he can.

Mr. BLAIR. I wish the Senator's opinion upon that as a parliamentary question, for I do not think that these speeches on our side that we are at the mercy of one-fifth of a quorum really represent the entire truth in the matter. I am a new member and I should like the opinion of the Senator as a very old parliamentarian in both branches of Congress as to whether I am correct in my view of the rules.

Mr. BECK. I will leave some of the better parliamentarians to answer that. It is a thing that has never happened and I think never will happen.

Mr. BLAIR. If the Senator cannot answer the question, I will ask somebody else some time who perhaps may know.

Mr. BECK. I do not like to confess, but the truth is, as the majority on this side of the Senate and perhaps on the other know, the Senator could hardly have put a parliamentary question to a Senator who knows less about parliamentary rules than I do.

Mr. BLAIR. I certainly cannot agree with the Senator.

Mr. BECK. I never go into those questions.

Mr. BLAIR. Although not an old member I have been reasonably closely observing of the character and qualifications of those with whom I have come in contact, and I thought the Senator from Kentucky knew more about this than any other member of the Senate, so that I am not to be shaken in my opinion by the fact that he does not answer this particular question.

Mr. BECK. The Senator from New Hampshire stated, and stated very well, that whether our conduct was revolutionary or otherwise depended very much upon the character of legislation that the party was seeking to oppose, very much upon the motive with which they oppose it, and of course the responsibility for their act falls upon the persons who do oppose any proposition. When interrupted I was proceeding to say (and that is about all I desire to say in addition to what I have said) that it is a conceded fact in this struggle that it is not necessary to remove the present officers of the Senate and to install others in their places for the purpose of transacting public business. It is a conceded fact on all sides that the Senate is now fully and efficiently organized; the committees are organized; every part of the machinery of the Senate is in its proper place, and all of the officers are competent and faithful and are performing their duties well. Therefore we are not by opposing the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts obstructing any public business, and therein we are not guilty of any revolutionary act. As to our motives in doing it, we have avowed that that responsibility must fall upon ourselves; but we insist that we are obstructing no public business; there is no necessity—the country know it, if you do not admit it—for doing what you are attempting to do; we are willing to go on with what is known and acknowledged to be necessary. Furthermore, I will say that you all know that you can now go into executive session, if you like, refer all the executive nominations to committees, pass upon such as there is no objection to, let the nominees who are here suspended go home and attend to their business, give their bonds, get their commissions, and go to work; that done, you can come back here into open session and carry on this wrangle just as efficiently as you are doing now, if you think it wise or politic to do it. It is absolutely silly for you to continue to go on as you have been doing.

That is what amazes me, why intelligent gentlemen charged with the responsibility of important public business, when they know they cannot do what they are trying to do here, when they have tried it for a month and are forced to admit that they cannot do it, do not do what they know they can do, what they know is important to be done, instead of seeking to do what they admit is not important, and for doing which the country will be no better off if they carry it out, because we have tried and faithful men in these places now. If the purpose is simply to let the people see how stubborn, how ugly, how mean, if you like, we are, they understand all that now, and no amount of ding-dong or scolding will make it any stronger or make them understand it any better; you are simply exposing yourselves by keeping up this farce any longer. The people of the country understand all these things perfectly; they believe that you have controversies and bickerings among yourselves about nominations, that you do not care to take the responsibility of exposing. I do not know whether you have or not; I am not in the confidence of the other side.

Mr. SHERMAN. Why not, then, test it by acting on the pending resolution, and in ten minutes you can develop the differences?

Mr. BECK. You may try it again when you have done the public work. Then you can come back and we will argue with you as long as you like, and stay with you all summer if you want to. In the mean time we will help you with the necessary public business. Why do you not go into executive session?

Mr. SHERMAN. There is the question; because we represent the majority of the Senate, which is the Senate, and the question now between the Senator from Kentucky and me is this: Shall the minority of the Senate, a confessed minority on this question, dictate to the majority the order of business? If they may do that, if they may dictate the order of business, they may defeat any measure, they may revolutionize the Senate and take from it the power of good or evil in the Government.

Mr. BECK. The Senator knows as well as I do that sometimes men are careless about voting, but whenever it comes to a test vote there is a tie every time, and it does not require the intervention of the Vice-President merely because we make affirmative propositions relative to executive sessions and other things.

Mr. SHERMAN. The reason of that is—the Senator knows it as well as I—that the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DAVIS] announced his purpose to vote to go into executive session, but he also announced his purpose to vote against any motion that would tend to prevent speedy and prompt action on the pending resolution. We ought not to deceive ourselves about that.

Mr. BECK. The Senator from Illinois has a written pair in which he votes "yea" on all questions on going into executive session.

Mr. SHERMAN. I understand.

Mr. BECK. On which he votes "nay" on all questions relative to this resolution, but does not vote at all on questions of adjournment. That is his pair. So we stand a tie on the question at issue, and I was about to add having only a tie and having the Senate held as it is, thirty-nine of us voted for General Hancock for President of the United States, while only thirty-seven gentlemen on the other side voted for the present President; and you have a Senator—I am not impeaching his title now—you have a Senator with you representing the State of Louisiana in which the body assuming to be the Legislature that sent him here is unknown on the statute-books of that State except by the single act of sending him here, and the governor (so called)—I believe he is now consul to Liverpool—who signed his credentials is unknown to the State of Louisiana except in that single act. So we are near enough a tie to have at least a good deal of feeling, leaving out of sight the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. MAHONE,] that there is not much right in the other side to announce with such emphasis any very well pronounced, well obtained majority. It seems to me that when, under these circumstances, we seek to proceed with the public business, it would be very well if the gentlemen on the other side would consider the importance of doing it instead of crying out revolution and treason. They fail to convince the country by such clap-trap.

I have carefully avoided discussing any of the questions about the South. She has representatives here now of her own, thank God; I was in the other House when she did not have them. I picked up a paper this morning, the New York World, and I was glad to read this; it is only a few lines of editorial matter:

> Texas by Senator COKE invited the North yesterday to "break the solid South by kindness and statesmanship." Maine by Senator FRYE and Massachusetts by Senator DAWES invite the South to remain "solid" by vituperation, insolence, and barefaced slander. With whom do the business men of the United States think it safest to intrust the future of this country?

That editorial puts the question in a very pertinent way; perhaps there is language in it which I would not use on this floor; but the country is disgusted in my judgment with this attempt to revive the old bloody-shirt quarrel. The people are caring but little about what took place ten years ago; they want to know what we propose to do hereafter. Look at the production of the crops in the South; look at the freedom from debt; look at the diminution of taxation; see what has happened in the last five or six years and compare the condition of the Southern States with the days of carpet-bag rule; and there is not a man in the world who will not admit that they have greatly improved their condition under democratic rule, and if they are let alone will improve day by day. The interest of all classes, races, and conditions of men are safest in the hands of those most interested in the peace and prosperity of the States in which they live.

Statements were read here the other day which went so far as to say that the State of Kentucky had repudiated some of her debt, about three millions of it. The distinguished Senator from Ohio was kind enough to come to my seat and call my attention to the statement, and to say that he thought that was a mistake. That has been exposed by the Louisville Courier-Journal. It was a mistake. Kentucky has paid her debts always. She owes nothing, has a surplus, is ready to take up her few outstanding bonds whenever the holders will allow her to take them up at 6 per cent.—there are very few of them outstanding. We have no tissue ballots, we stand up and vote viva voce, every man votes, black and white, who is twenty-one years of age and has been one year in his county or two years in the State and sixty days in his precinct; and no man was ever dismissed from his position or questioned in consequence of his color or because of his vote. I have had my own house servant wait all day at the polls until I came there so he could have the pleasure of casting his vote to kill mine, but I never thought of calling him to account for it, and so it is with all of us. We have a full vote and a fair count. We have our troubles and peculiarities of course; our men fight and quarrel and do a great many bad things. That is our business. I have never taken any pains, and do not intend in this body, to defend the State against any aspersions that may be made against it. Other States have their peculiar troubles; their people do as bad things as we do, much worse in other regards. That is their business.

The business before us as Senators, that for which we are called together in executive session, is to aid the President in seeing that the laws are faithfully executed and in seeing that the treaties made in accordance with the Constitution are duly acted upon. We propose to do that every day and nearly every hour, and we are not going to be diverted from that legitimate purpose, in my opinion, by any proposition to take up any outside matter.

I beg the Senate's pardon for having spoken so long.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Mr. President——

Mr. SHERMAN. Will the Senator allow me a few words before he proceeds?

Mr. BURNSIDE. Yes, sir.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I do not intend to engage in any discussion, because I think the debate is exhausted. The propositions really pending in the Senate are so few and simple, and they have been so frequently stated, that it is scarcely worth while to say anything more, and I thought nothing would tempt me to reply even to some remarks that were made during my absence; but as the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] has stated the issue broadly, clearly, and distinctly, I will give him my view of the case as he presents it.

He says, if I understand him correctly, that the minority on that side of the Chamber have made up their minds deliberately that they will not allow this Senate to vote upon the resolution which is now pending. That they have made up their mind to do. They say they will prevent it by resorting to dilatory motions, by resorting to every device authorized by parliamentary law. I say that they are not justified in this opposition, that this is clearly indefensible unless there is some extraordinary reason, some reason involving great morality, some reason involving the safety of the country, some extraordinary reason which would justify extraordinary measures. I understood the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] in the debate the other day to admit that these dilatory tactics may be carried on to a certain extent justifiably to give the minority a chance, but that they had no right to resort to them to defeat the will of the majority unless for some grave and strong reasons, and he told us he would give us in the remarks he made reasons that in his judgment would justify the minority in taking that course. I did not think the reasons that he gave were sufficient; but now the Senator from Kentucky abandons the position taken by the Senator from Delaware and says that they intend upon the case now before them to prevent the majority from having a vote on the resolution. I say that is revolutionary. I know that these tactics of delay have been resorted to by parties in all the history of the Government; but there never has been a time in the history of the Senate of the United States when this position has been taken before. I have inquired and looked into it. Never before did a minority or any number of Senators say to the Senate "You shall not have a vote on that pending proposition this session, or next session, or for some indefinite period." Therefore this proceeding is new. There have been times when dilatory motions have been made to create a little delay for a day or two or three or four days. The longest perhaps was the action at the beginning of this session when the republicans felt justified in order to have a full membership in resorting to dilatory motions for something like two weeks. That was a great stretch of the power to make these dilatory motions. The case has occurred three times in the history of this Government when in the Senate resort was had to the course of Senators refusing to vote in order to prevent a quorum or prevent a result, but in every case it was rebuked.

I do not say anything against Senators for adopting these tactics, because all of us probably may do it for a time; but this is the first time in the history of the American Senate when it has been distinctly proclaimed by a minority of this body, shown to be a minority on successive votes, that they will not allow the majority to have a vote on a pending proposition. If this can be resorted to with a very large minority, if it can be resorted to even in a case where the minority is but one less than the majority, it may be resorted to by a minority of eight, and if that becomes the principle of parliamentary law which governs the Senate we shall be compelled to change our rules; we shall be compelled to adopt the usages of our fathers; we shall be compelled to do what the House of Commons did to defeat dilatory motions in a recent case; we shall be compelled to do to a certain extent what the House of Representatives has been compelled to do, resort to changes of our rules and to various expedients to give the majority control over the business of the Senate. I say the announcement of that purpose and practice upon it will enable a minority of eight, which is a sufficient number to order the yeas and nays when a bare quorum is present, to revolutionize our rules and compel the Senate from sheer necessity to change its rules, and it is not a wise thing to do.

Now, sir, whatever may be the feelings of Senators in regard to the officers here, and I can appreciate them, I say they are not justified, they are not justified in good policy, they are not justified according to the usages of the Senate, they are not justified in good morals in resorting to these revolutionary expedients for so small an object. If they believed the safety of the country was involved, if they believed that a great crime was about to be committed, some extraordinary event was to occur which authorized them to resort to these expedients, they might be justified each man in his own conscience. But they cannot say that. All the pretenses that these gentlemen have given and all their long speeches are perfectly idle. The whole proceeding is based on the fact that the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MAHONE] who comes here announces his purpose to vote with us, and I never knew of it until he made his announcement here on this floor to the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. HILL.] No one felt sure at all about the course that he might pursue. But because that Senator chose to take his present course, to give that as a reason for this extraordinary action is perfectly idle. Such things have been done over and over again. The Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. Sumner) did it; the Senator from Wisconsin (Mr. Doolittle) did it; I have seen more than twenty Senators on this floor entirely disappoint their political friends and go out and vote against the majority.

Why, sir, the course of my friend from Georgia, [Mr. BROWN]—and I speak of it with the greatest kindness—to whose election men of my political faith heartily contributed, even his course in this debate has disappointed us; but do we say anything unkind of him? On the contrary, we treat him with the highest respect. So every Senator must have the right of independence always; it ought to be cultivated in the Senate; it ought to be nourished and cherished. When one man comes out from his party and takes any course upon any vote showing an independence of character, that ought to be cultivated and encouraged in the Senate if nowhere else. This body was intended to be a body of independent men. Therefore the adoption of such a rule as the Senator from Kentucky has promulgated does revolutionize this body, gives a small minority a dangerous power, and will compel the Senate if enforced, in time, to change its rules when it can.

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator from Ohio allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. HARRIS. Is it the purpose of the Senator from Ohio to vote for the resolution that declares Riddleberger Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate if we reach that resolution?

Mr. SHERMAN. It is undoubtedly.

Mr. HARRIS. Then is Riddleberger the independent choice of the Senator from Ohio for that particular office over all the life-long republicans and Union soldiers who would like to have that office?

Mr. SHERMAN. No, sir.

Mr. HARRIS. He is not?

Mr. SHERMAN. No, sir. If I had the right to choose the officers of the Senate, I might not choose either of the men that have been nominated or those that are now occupying the places; and I am inclined to think that if the Senate will go back to the early period of the history of this body they will find that the officers of the Senate were as a rule men of a little higher grade than we are presented with now.

Mr. HARRIS. Then we are——

Mr. SHERMAN. Let me answer the question. I vote for Mr. Riddleberger because I am informed that he is an honorable and able man, a man of influence in his State, a man of good character, good standing, who has been a good soldier in a bad cause and none the less worthy for that if he believed it was a good cause. I shall vote for him because it is believed by the majority of my political friends that he is the best man to perform the duties of the office, and I am glad to say I have not heard a single Senator on that side of the House say one word against his character, one word against his qualifications, one word against his fitness to perform the humble duties of Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate.

Mr. HARRIS. If I understand the Senator from Ohio aright, he does not propose to practice that independence of voting upon this floor that he lauds in others and recommends to others.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do intend——

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Riddleberger is not his choice; yet he has resolved to vote for him.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, in all matters (and no one knows it better than my friend from Tennessee) where certain persons are called upon to nominate a candidate for a political party, sometimes a man's choice is not always obtained. We know that, and as a matter of course we vote with our party unless there is some good reason given why we should not; and what reason, I would ask the Senator from Tennessee, does he give why I should not vote for Mr. Riddleberger. Does he want me to refuse to vote for him because he was a confederate soldier? Is that the reason, I should like to know? I ask the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. HARRIS. I beg the Senator's pardon. I was diverted and I did not hear his question.

Mr. SHERMAN. What reason can he give why I should not vote for Mr. Riddleberger? Is he not a man of honor, a man of character, a man of ability, a man able to discharge the duties of this office?

Mr. HARRIS. The only reason I can assign is that he is not the choice of the Senator from Ohio, and the honorable Senator from Ohio preaches a doctrine, which I think is sound, that every Senator should vote his honest convictions of duty and his honest judgment on this floor and not be controlled by others.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will ask my friend if he voted for Horace Greeley for President?

Mr. HARRIS. My impression is that I did as a choice of evils; I took the lesser evil.

Mr. SHERMAN. That shows that in the selection of candidates as a matter of course the minority in every political party must give way, provided the man selected is a man of character, a man of standing, fit for the office; and if these gentlemen can give any reason why we should not vote for Riddleberger I might answer the question of the Senator from Tennessee differently; but now what are the reasons that are given? First, he was a confederate soldier. Well, most of you on that side of the House have been confederate soldiers.

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator will pardon me. If I understand the history of Mr. Riddleberger, I think he is distinguished for three things. He was the leader of a confederate cavalry company, and is said to have been a gallant and daring leader. I honor him for having followed his convictions of duty wheresoever they may have led. He has been more recently distinguished as a leader of the readjuster party. I have not gone sufficiently into the details of that question in Virginia to know for myself exactly what it means; but it is generally understood to have been a repudiation party. He has been more recently distinguished as a Hancock elector for the State at large in Virginia. Now, exactly what motive could have controlled the republican Senators on this floor to nominate Riddleberger, with that record, for the high position of Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate, when they had tens of thousands of life-long republicans and wounded Union soldiers who would have gladly accepted the position, is what we cannot very well understand, and I supposed the Senator from Ohio could enlighten us if he would. I am eager for information on that subject.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, the Senator from Tennessee did not give the reasons why I will vote for Mr. Riddleberger. The reasons that he gives are such as might have induced him to vote for Riddleberger; but the reasons why I shall vote for Riddleberger are very different. I do not object to him because he was a confederate soldier; because whenever a confederate soldier will act in harmony with the constitutional amendments which have been adopted, will seek to carry them out in good faith, I welcome him into the republican fold at all times. I do not object to him so much because of his being a readjuster. I do not know much difference——

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator allow me to ask a question right here as to whether or not Riddleberger has come into the republican fold?

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not yield now; I will submit to any question in a moment. I do not object to him and would not vote for him because of his connection with the readjusters; on the contrary that is somewhat of an objection to him; but the difference between a debt-payer, according to the Virginia plan, and a readjuster is so narrow and vague that I cannot see very much distinction between them; both consent to the repudiation, as I think, of a large portion of the debt of the Old Dominion of Virginia. Nor do I object to him so much, nor do I vote for him because he voted for Hancock; he voted for Hancock, it is true, upon an independent platform different from what is called the Bourborn democratic platform. But the reason I vote for him is that Mr. Riddleberger in published discourses and in letters that have been read to you here, has openly proclaimed his purpose to stand by those in Virginia who are determined to see that elections are fairly and honestly conducted, that there shall be a fair election and a fair count; that every citizen of Virginia entitled by their laws to a vote shall have the right to vote, and that no obstructive law like an unjust poll tax shall be thrust in the face of the voter to prevent him from voting; that people shall not be disfranchised by local expedients of this kind. It is because Mr. Riddleberger taking his seat by Mr. MAHONE proclaims his independence of that democracy which has made a solid South, therefore an enemy to the institutions of the country, because in my judgment any party that binds together in one mass a section on sectional grounds and sectional issues is an enemy to this country, and the greatest act of friendship I can do or that republicans can do or that we hope to do or expect to do is to break up that grim specter which haunts American politics and will haunt it as long as "the solid South" based upon confederate issues and the leaders of whom are all men who have yet expressed no regret for the past and no hearty willingness to acquiesce in the amendments and the logical results of the amendments. That is the reason I vote for Mr. Riddleberger. Why should I not? There is the question. If you would debate the character or merits of these gentlemen, that would be very proper; but when you go beyond that and tell us that although you are in a minority you have made up your minds that we shall not have a vote on that resolution, you do precisely what has been done in every revolution in Mexico or South America; it is a case of the minority refusing the majority the right to rule. You say and you very properly say——

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Will the Senator from Ohio allow me to ask a question?

Mr. SHERMAN. Oh! no; not now, if you please. You have said in your arguments publicly, some of which I have read and many of which I have heard, that this is not a government of majorities. That is true; but it is a government of constitutional majorities. In this Senate the power is with the majority of Senators from equal and from unequal States, equal in point of political power and very unequal in wealth, population, and numbers; it is the major number of Senators here that constitutes the majority. So with the electoral college; it is not a majority of voters that counts, but the majority of the electors.

Mr. HARRIS. Does the Senator claim that the republicans have a majority of Senators on this floor?

Mr. SHERMAN. I claim that on this question we have the majority of Senators. But what difference does it make? Does not the Constitution, which is the highest law, which you have sworn to support, say that whenever there is a tie the Vice-President shall cast a vote, and is not his vote there just as constitutional as yours, though you are conceded to be the able Senator from the State of Tennessee? You should not palter or hang upon fractions; this Government does not rest upon fractions. The makers of the Constitution have guarded against these dangers by an equal division of power everywhere. They have provided in every case for the tie, and in this case it is provided for. And, sir, whenever you who have not got the advantage of the vote of the Vice-President say we shall not vote on this resolution, you do what is revolutionary, because if that principle is carried to its logical sequence a very small minority of this body may break up the Senate and disorganize it, compel it to abandon all the rules and usages that have made it a body of free debate without limit or restraint, and compel the adoption of restraints and limits. That is all there was in the controversy between the Senator from Kentucky and me. He asked with a good deal of force, "As we do not intend to let you have a vote on this resolution why do you not go on with other business?" I do not know what the majority of the Senate may be compelled to do, but I say that what you have done when you compel us to think of what we shall do endangers our Government, revives the habit of the Mexican and South American republics, revives again the example that you set in 1861 when because Abraham Lincoln was elected President you started a war to break up the Government.

It is on the acquiescence of the minority in the will of the majority that all free governments rest; and if the urn though it may disclose a thousand votes cast shows a majority of but one in favor of the winning side, that acquiescence should always be hearty. So it has been always. In the State of Massachusetts—Senators may think it strange—a democratic governor was once elected by one vote and was counted in. So here although our majority is small it seems to me it would have been better for you, wiser for you, and according to the constitutional rules to have allowed that majority to have had its way and then to have denounced that majority for anything you chose to denounce them for.

But now, forsooth, the Senator from Kentucky says the minority has made up its mind what it will do; it has taken its ground; it says "you shall not do it because we can prevent it." Then he says "you may denounce us." Ah, that is putting the cart before the horse. The minority has no right to say what shall be brought up in this body; it has no constitutional power to regulate the order of business. You yielded that when you yielded the committees of this body; you gave to the republicans the power of managing the machinery of this body. Why should we have the committees if we have not the power to say what shall be brought up and what shall not be brought up?

No, gentlemen, whatever may come of this contest, I believe it will be the judgment of every reader of history, of every lawyer in the land, of every patriot who understands both sides of the question, that the democrats in this controversy have taken a wrong issue, that they are not justified in resorting to these extraordinary measures on such a petty matter as this, and that will be the opinion of the country, I judge.

Whatever may be the result of this contest I do not propose to go into the question now or at any time about the payment of the debts of the State. I am having prepared and will in due time perhaps, if I think it worth while, submit to the Senate a full and accurate statement of what every State has done in respect to its public debt. I do not choose to characterize what has been done. I have no doubt that both parties have participated in the measures. I do not see why that matter should be lugged in here as a matter of controversy. I have some papers here which show that the statement made by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CAMDEN] the other day is controverted in many important particulars, also some in reply to the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. HARRIS,] but I do not care to go into them because the action of the several States in regard to their public debts has nothing to do with this controversy. Whatever else may be said, each State must regulate its internal affairs to suit itself. If a State chooses to repudiate it is first its fault, and then it is its misfortune.

When I said the other day that no republican State had ever repudiated, my friend from Missouri, [Mr. VEST,] replying to me, found at last that Minnesota had repudiated some three or four millions of bonds according to what he said, and the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. MCMILLAN] denied it. Well, Minnesota had better have paid those three millions of bonds five times over as she can now do, rather than have that reproach thrown in her face, and I trust she will do it and settle the matter. I know there was a controversy about it, and I understood also as a matter of history that those bonds were issued by a democratic legislature and under a democratic government. Is not that so? [Addressing Mr. MCMILLAN.]

Mr. MCMILLAN. Yes.

Mr. SHERMAN. Therefore the origin of these bonds commenced with a democratic assembly and when the State was democratic. Afterward when the State became republican the question came up in the courts, and the courts held that the bonds were illegally issued.

Mr. MCMILLAN. No.

Mr. SHERMAN. They did not? Then the republicans who were at that time in power failed to respond to the decision of the court and failed to provide for the payment of the bonds, and in that they did wrong. My impression always had been that the republicans never had anything to do with it; but when they failed to pay the bonds which the supreme court of that State decided were valid they did wrong, but I have no doubt they will correct it, and they ought to correct it.

The Senator from Tennessee the other day said that Tennessee had not repudiated at all. Neither has it, and I hope under his leadership it will make a good compromise with its creditors; but what it did do was this: it refused to pay the interest year in and year out——

Mr. HARRIS. The word "failed" would be a better word than the word "refused."

Mr. SHERMAN. It failed; you cannot draw nice distinctions; and the people of Tennessee do not pay, I am told, more than about one-third as much taxes as many of the Northern States pay. Whether that is so or not, they failed to levy taxes, and that is an act of repudiation, and it is a practical refusal. But it is not necessary for me to go into these matters.

Now in regard to Kentucky, the table of Mr. Porter was wrong. The very moment I glanced at it I knew it, because the people of Kentucky had always been careful of the honor of their State and had always paid their debts, and I knew that fact very well. It had paid off $3,000,000; but in the statement the amount of the debt in 1860 was given and then the amount in 1880 was given, and it was found that the debt of Kentucky was $3,000,000 less at one time than at another, and therefore it was put among those States that had scaled their debts, but Kentucky had scaled her debt in the way it ought to have been scaled, by actual payment, and therefore Kentucky ought not to have been included in that list.

Mr. HARRIS. Does the Senator from Ohio allude to that newspaper statement of Mr. Porter, referring to Mr. Porter as an officer of the Census Bureau?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes.

Mr. HARRIS. Seeking to give that article a semi-official character so as to give it a higher degree of authenticity than it could otherwise have had, and without exception as to Kentucky or the injustice that that statement did any State in the Union.

Mr. SHERMAN. All I said about that was that it was written by Mr. Porter, who had charge of the returns in regard to the State debts in the Census Office, and I said that ten States of the South had either repudiated or failed to pay the interest on their debt, and I omitted Kentucky; and on account of the very fact that I saw Kentucky on that list I went to the Senator from Kentucky and asked him how Kentucky could appear in that list, and he said it was a mistake, and I admitted it. Indeed, on that list, if Senators will look, there are thirteen States. I took ten that I knew of as a matter of general history, among the rest Tennessee, a State that failed to provide for its interest.

Now, Mr. President, these are all collateral matters; they have nothing to do with this debate. Indeed this question of repudiation has nothing to do with the Senate. We have no power over the States, and any State that palters with its public faith will always in the end suffer. I would rather that Mr. Riddleberger and all the candidates we are called upon to vote for had in some respects been different from what they are; but until we hear from Senators on the other side that Mr. Riddleberger is not an honorable man, a brave soldier in what I think was a bad cause, what they think was a good one, a man who is now willing to do justice to white and black in the South and is willing to stand by the Senator from Virginia in his course of independence, I will stand by him and vote for him with the greatest pleasure, but with no desire at all to do an injustice to the incumbents, to whom I would in accordance with the usages and customs of the Senate give the usual amount of pay, because that seems to have been the course time out of mind when such changes have been made.

There was another thing the Senator from Kentucky said, which I think he will fail to make good; he said that there was some suspicion when the war broke out that the then officers of the Senate sympathized with the South or were taking part with the South. I understood him to say that. That was not so, if I remember aright.

Mr. BECK. I understood that that was the fact; or at least it was so supposed.

Mr. SHERMAN. As soon as I mention the name, the Senator will see that it was not so.

Mr. BECK. It is so long ago I cannot verify anything about them.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Asbury Dickins, who had held the office of Secretary of the Senate I think for about twenty-five years at that time, through many different administrations, was Secretary of the Senate when I became a member of this body. No one proposed to remove him until he became disabled wholly by physical infirmities only a short time before his death. Then we elected at the subsequent regular session of Congress a Secretary of the Senate in his place, and Mr. Dickins would not have been turned out by any Senator, nor was his position on the southern question or on the question of the war then coming up ever doubted by any man whatever. I believe he was considered a very patriotic man. The name of the then Sergeant-at-Arms I do not now recall, but my impression is he was in the same condition. There was no question at all as to their fitness; there was no question at all as to their fidelity to the Government; and at that time no doubt there was little desire to turn out Mr. Dickins, and even afterward, nearly a year afterward, when Colonel Forney was elected Secretary, it was only after full and ample provision had been made for Mr. Dickins, with his consent, that the change was made.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Rhode Island was entitled to the floor and gave way to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator from Kentucky that I do not think he did me exact justice in the remarks he made this morning with reference to what I said the other day. In the first place he stated that I walked down to the front, evidently trying to give the impression that I went there with a view of giving more emphasis to what I was going to say. Now, I have never since I have been in the Senate left my seat when I desired to speak. On that day I happened to be in the seat of my colleague [Mr. ANTHONY] or that of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] alongside of it—I forget which—and I spoke from that place where I was, and did not move down to the front.

He says also that I said this thing must stop. Now, I want to read to him what I did say. I was referring to the charges made on that side of the Chamber in reference to a corrupt bargain on this side, and the Senator says I said this thing must stop; now let me read to the Senate exactly what I did say. Speaking of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] I said:

> My friend knows the high regard I have for him. There is no man in the Senate Chamber for whom I have a higher personal regard on either side than I have for the Senator; but I do say this thing ought to stop. I do not say it must stop because I cannot stop it, but I say it ought to stop; that in all decency, in all propriety, in all honesty, in all fair dealing, the thing ought to stop.

The Senator from Kentucky, I am sure, will not hesitate to take back that part of his speech. Now, I want to go further.

Mr. BECK. Let me say one word. In the remarks I made about the Senator from Rhode Island, I want him to understand that whatever he says is the fact about what he said, I accept absolutely. Really what I did say about him was more casual than otherwise this morning, and he knows in no ill temper; I have too much respect for him for that.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I know that. I know the Senator from Kentucky would not do me any harm; but I am very anxious to do away with any impression which may have been made upon the mind of the Senator from Kentucky or anybody else that it is my disposition to get into an altercation in this Senate Chamber. It is my disposition to treat every Senator with due courtesy; and if in my inexperience in debate I depart from that I am always ready, and I hope I shall be always found ready, to make any amends; but in this case I made no such demand, in fact I distinctly avowed that I could not stop it.

The Senator spoke, to be sure, in a jocular way with reference to the danger that he might be shot, or something of that kind, in connection with his remarks about me. I am perfectly willing the Senator shall indulge in any jocose remarks in reference to me whenever he likes; I know they are always in good temper; but I want to say to him and I want to say to the Senate that it has never crossed my mind for one moment to charge upon any Senator upon this floor any personal dishonor or any personal bad intent toward me or any member on this side. All my remarks in debate were made in reference to general charges made on the other side of the Chamber. I desired on that day to give in the most emphatic way possible a denial to the charge which had been made or insinuated upon that side, that there was a corrupt bargain on this side, and I desired to make the denial just as emphatic as the charge had been made, and I desired to impress on the country and on my constituents that that was an incorrect and false charge.

It was very far from my mind, as far as anything could be, to impute personal untruthfulness to anybody on that side of the Chamber, much less the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. BUTLER,] with whom my relations have been always of the most friendly nature, peculiarly so; and I would be the last man on this floor to impute to him any personal dishonor or any personal untruthfulness. Anybody, no matter who he is, anywhere in this country, who draws any other inference from what I then said, draws a wrong inference, and I do not think he is borne out by the language I used. My language was emphatic, and I intended it to be so; I meant it to be so. I was replying to a general charge made on that side of the Chamber; and unfortunately for the Senator from South Carolina and myself, who are such good friends and who had never been in collision in debate before, we happened to be the two Senators to meet. It would have been as unfortunate in the case of any other Senator, because I have no disposition to get into an altercation with any Senator on that side of the Chamber or on this. When I want to bulldoze anybody, I will not take any Senator on either side of this Chamber; I cannot put my mind on any Senator on either side of the Chamber who would submit to it.

Another thing: when I want to make a personal imputation, I will go to the Senator or the man, whoever he is, and tell him personally that I do not think he is speaking the truth; or that I think he is making a false charge. I did not mean to create any such impression in anybody's mind; but if I did it, I hope it will be removed.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I am quite sure, without the disclaimer on the part of the Senator from Rhode Island, that he did not intend to impute any dishonorable conduct to me. I understood him to say that he was denouncing the charge generally and making no personal application of his remarks to me. My relations with that Senator have always been friendly and kind; I know his kindness of heart is so pronounced that he is incapable of making a reflection of that kind on a brother Senator. I am happy to hear that he has said it publicly, and I accept it of course in the spirit in which he has made it, and I am sure, as far as I am concerned, that our former relations have not been disturbed in the slightest.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, if I did make a little blunder this morning in making any suggestion about the Senator from Rhode Island, I think that the feelings expressed by himself and the Senator from South Carolina have fully vindicated any blunder I may have made by the restoration of entire harmony.

Mr. JONAS. Mr. President, as I stated yesterday I heard that full information was on the way to me in regard to the outrages said to have been committed upon the gray-headed individual alluded to by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] which outrages he had first located in Mississippi and afterward transferred to Louisiana; I received this morning a long and full dispatch which I will read to the Senate:

NEW ORLEANS, LOUISIANA, April 21, 1881.

Hon. B. F. JONAS, United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Immediately on receipt of the Boston Advertiser's account of the statement of Charles Heath, formerly of Caldwell Parish, the Democrat dispatched a special representative to the spot to investigate and to report the facts and truth of said statement. The following is a special dispatch just received from him:

COLUMBIA, LOUISIANA, April 20, via Monroe, April 21.

[Special to the New Orleans Democrat.]

In accordance with your instructions to gather all the facts concerning the burning of Heath's place last December, the political feeling in the parish, and other matters bearing on his recent publication, I have fully investigated the matter. The result of my labors is summed up in the statements appended, from District Judge Bridger, ex-Judge Caldwell, a prominent republican, District Attorney Wear, and other leading citizens. I furnish the Democrat what they say over their own signatures in place of any report of my own. The facts as given by Judge Bridger:

COLUMBIA, LOUISIANA, April 20.

In accordance with the request of the Democrat's representative for information as to the truth of the publication made by Charles Heath concerning the burning of his property in this parish on the night of the 25th of December, 1880, I will state that Charles Heath owns no property in this parish and that he never has owned any. His brother, Edward Heath, owns a plantation in this parish situated in ward No. 7 ten miles below Columbia. The property was given in and assessed last fall in the name of Edward Heath, being given in as two hundred and sixty acres of land and valued, including all buildings thereon, at $2,500; value of horses, mares, mules, neat cattle, &c., $565; cash value of all carriages, wagons, and vehicles of all kinds, $75; cash value of all merchandise, of stock in trade, $400; making the total appraised value of Edward Heath's property in this parish $3,540, which was a liberal and fair appraisement.

I will pause here to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that last fall before the fire, while this plantation had all the improvements upon it, while the buildings, the cotton-gin, the saw-mill, were yet unburnt, and while the mules and implements of husbandry were yet upon the soil, while the goods were yet in the stores, the whole of this property was appraised at $3,500. Mr. Heath in his statement, as repeated by the Senator from Massachusetts, says that the value of this property was $25,000. He says moreover that his property comprised between nine hundred and one thousand acres of land. This evidence shows that the plantation comprised but two hundred and sixty acres of land. These are two small and trivial variations in the statement made by Mr. Charles Heath, and indorsed by the Senator, from the facts as furnished by the official records in the parish of Caldwell!

Charles Heath usually visited the place and managed it for his brother. He was never on the place more than three or four months during each year. The place was generally leased to or worked on shares by colored laborers. The land of the principal white land-owners in the ward is worked by colored persons. There are about one hundred colored voters in the ward and twenty white voters. At the last election the vote stood, democrats 12, republicans 64. Faulkner's and Blanks's plantations in the ward are five times larger and worth five times as much. Neither one of them has resided on their places since the close of the war; they have been leased or cultivated by colored laborers—

Here I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that all of the largest plantations in that parish, all plantations in the neighborhood, owned by old settlers and old citizens, are and have been cultivated since the war by colored laborers without the supervision of white overseers or white owners, exactly as Mr. Heath says he cultivated his plantation, and for doing which he says he was opposed, molested, and persecuted by his neighbors—cultivated by colored laborers on the share system the same as Heath's, and in a majority of years there was no white manager or white man on the places. Sizemore has not resided on his place for two years, and it has been cultivated by colored laborers for several years. Haas's plantation was worked on the same system. During all this time I never heard of any objection or complaint against the system or plan of managing these places, and there never was any trouble or outrage perpetrated in the ward. The colored people in the ward sometimes have personal difficulties between themselves. Mr. Heath nor no one else in the ward was ever threatened or molested in consequence of the management of their plantations. It is on account of its location rather isolated from the remainder of the parish, there being but few whites in it. It is controlled by the colored population in it. The ward is represented in the police jury by a colored man who is also a member of the parish school board; the justice of the peace and constable are both colored. The statement of Charles Heath in relation to the alleged troubles and the causes are false. In the first place, every one in this parish manages his property or plantation to suit himself, and I have never heard any objection or protest to their so doing. It is a fact that plantations are leased in various parts of the parish to colored laborers with not a single white man upon them, and I have never heard of an objection or difficulty in consequence thereof. The plantation belonging to the P. R. Smith heirs, in Ward No. 1, being worth six times the value of the Heath place and in the finest section of the parish, is now and has been for years leased and controlled entirely by colored people, there not being a white man on the place. Mr. Heath's gin and mill was burned on the night of the 25th of December, 1880. Heath says the burning of the property was not alluded to in the papers.

You will remember that I stated that it could not be possible that the fire had not been mentioned in any paper in the State of Louisiana.

The Columbia (Louisiana) Herald of the 31st of December, 1880, contains the following:

"FIRES.—On Sunday night last, the 26th, the Heath gin-house and store burned to the ground. This gin was constructed in New Orleans and brought to Mr. Heath's place, about nine miles below Columbia. It was run by steam, and was insured, but for what amount we are unable to say."

There having been several fires recently in the parish, and all the buildings burned being insured, I determined to have the matter investigated. Our district court met on the first Monday in January, and in my charge to the grand jury I called their attention to these facts and instructed them to investigate the matter fully. I directed their special attention to the Heath burning, and directed them to investigate the affair. The following is an extract from the report of the grand jury at that term:

"That they have made special inquiry into the burning of the gin and mill of Heath, situated on Long Lake plantation, and find it the general opinion of persons residing in the vicinity of the said plantation that the burning was the work of an incendiary but find no clue to the perpetrator of the act."

It is reported that the property destroyed was fully covered by insurance. I have conversed with an eye-witness of the burning the Heath gin and the circumstances attending it, and am fully convinced that the property was burned to obtain the insurance-money. The foreman of the jury informed me that while they could not get sufficient evidence to authorize them to find a bill, yet he was fully persuaded and convinced in his own mind that the property was burned to obtain the insurance-money. This is the general opinion of those in the parish who are acquainted with the facts. Indeed I think evidence has been obtained sufficient to justify the grand jury at the July term in finding a bill. Our jurors are disposed to perform their duties regardless of persons, as two convictions for arson were made at the January term. There are mortgages on record against Heath's property in this parish to the amount of $11,283.27. I learn, but cannot say that it is true, that the property burned was insured for $4,000. The appraisers appointed and sworn to fix its value since the fire, with a view of collecting the insurance, inform me that they fixed its value at $1,400. Heath says he has 1,000 acres valued at, including buildings, $25,000. His assessment shows two hundred and sixty acres valued at, including buildings, $2,500. He intimates that he had a large stock at the time of the fire. The appraisement, cash value, of the merchandise or stock in trade was $400; and I am informed by the sheriff and others familiar with his business that he never had a large stock on hand, and at the time of the fire the stock was much smaller. His statements are totally false and a slander on the people of our parish. With the exception of an occasional personal difficulty among the colored people themselves in the ward, and larceny cases, there has been no outrage or crime committed in the ward. With the exception of larceny, it is a peaceable and law-abiding ward, and the colored people in the ward, except those who live and deal with Heath, are prosperous and happy and are making money; those who work and deal with Heath are in debt and do not seem to prosper like those who have not had dealings with him.

I have not seen the publication made by Heath, and am therefore only in possession of such charges as you have communicated.

STATEMENT OF JUDGE CALDWELL.

COLUMBIA, April 20, 1881.

Judge Caldwell is a republican. I have known him since we were both very young men. He was born and raised in this very parish, and has lived all of his life there and in the adjoining parish of Onachita. He was a Union man during the late war, and has been a stanch republican ever since. He is a man of education and talent, and is respected by the people among whom he has always lived.

I am a republican; have been so since the close of the war; was born in this parish in 1830; am a lawyer; voted for Grant twice; was parish judge of Ouachita Parish, Louisiana, from 1870 to 1873, under appointment of Governor Warmoth; became a resident of Caldwell Parish, Louisiana, in the month of September, 1878; settled in Columbia and knew the place owned by Mr. Heath. There has been no more quiet parish in politics than Caldwell Parish. Everything for years past has been conducted on amicable principles, so far as politics are involved. Every man in this parish can freely speak his political sentiments without fear of molestation. No man's property is endangered on account of his political feelings.

ROBT. J. CALDWELL.

WHAT DISTRICT ATTORNEY WEAR SAYS.

District attorney Wear is mentioned in the communication of Mr. Heath.

COLUMBIA, LOUISIANA, April 20, 1881.

I have seen what purports to be the statement of Charles Heath relative to the burning of the property of Edward Heath, situated in this parish, together with the treatment of colored laborers in said parish of Caldwell. From my intimate knowledge of the people in the parish of Caldwell, in which the property destroyed was situated, I am constrained to say that the statements of Mr. Charles Heath are altogether untrue and without foundation in fact.

Very respectfully,

GEO. WEAR,
District Attorney Fourth District of Louisiana.

Upon receipt of special dispatches from Caldwell Parish yesterday, the editor of the Democrat waited upon Edward Heath, esq., and presented the dispatches for his examination with the offer to publish simultaneously such explanations as Mr. Heath desired to make after reading the report carefully.

Edward Heath is the brother residing in New Orleans, in whose name the title of the property is held.

He said that Charles Heath's statement was in the main correct; that they had been badly treated by individuals in Caldwell Parish, and regretted ever owning property there. When asked to state the nature of their complaints specifically, he said that Heath & Gould acquired the property for debt about 1867; were advised that people opposed plantations being worked by negroes without a white man on the place; they employed a white overseer, who managed badly, discharged him and employed another white overseer. Their first troubles then commenced, the mules were stolen, and the overseer said he was afraid to follow them. Heath says he suspected the overseer of knowledge and complicity, and discharged him. Charles Heath went there to arrange with colored men to work the place. A mule was shot, and one night a colored man named Harris, from New Orleans, was shot in the arm. A number of citizens came next morning and expressed sympathy for Harris and regret for the act, but the Heaths believe it was on account of opposition to negroes working the lands.

Which in fact seems to have been the custom with all their neighbors in the parish, and had been since the war.

Gould and himself visited Warmoth while the latter was governor, and demanded protection. Gould claimed to be a democrat, therefore he ought not to be ill-treated. Gould told Warmoth he was a damned good democrat. All the satisfaction he got was that Warmoth told Gould if he was a damned good democrat he ought to be killed. Heath declares that these events occurred during 1867, 1868, 1869, and 1870. The next occurrence was seven or eight years ago; the gin was burned. In reply to a question if the burning was attributed to politics, he admitted that Charles Heath had loaned the gin to Gould to gin his cotton. Gould left the place in charge of negroes, who failed to oil the machinery and set the gin on fire accidentally. When asked to designate the next cause of complaint, he said: three or four years ago Nathan Davis had his cotton ginned by Charles Heath, who refused to deliver it until paid for; this caused trouble and Davis made threats of violence. This was reported to Governor Nicholls, who did not see any cause to interfere. There was no further trouble until the gin and store were burned, December 25, last year. When asked if he attributed the burning to politics, Mr. Heath declared he could not say so. He intimated that he suspected Davis but had no proofs.

In reply to the question how there was a mortgage for $11,000 on property assessed at $2,500, Mr. Heath said he became embarrassed last year, and got an extension from his creditors. He gave them a mortgage on all his property in Louisiana. That is matter for his creditors. As to the value of the two hundred and sixty acres of land, he said it was worth from ten to twenty dollars per acre, but he would sell out for $10. Estimating his land at $15 per acre, or $5 more than he will sell for, the land would be worth $3,900. He has been paid full value for the improvements destroyed. The question arises where he is loser. The agent of the insurance company states that the gin was insured for $2,250, cotton $150, store $1,800; total insurance, $4,200. The property had not been insured for several years. About two months before the burning, short policies for four and six months were taken by Edward Heath. The company, not satisfied with the appearance of things, sent an adjuster to Caldwell Parish; there was an investigation by the grand jury, and suspicions, but no proofs of foul play were developed. He believed the stock was overinsured, and found that a new gin could be built for $1,900, but finally compromised with Heath for $3,325.—New Orleans Democrat.

These, Mr. President, are the facts, facts obtained from the parish in which it has pleased the honorable Senator at last to locate his pretended outrage. Such in my belief would have turned out to have been the facts had he located the outrage or similar outrages in other portions of the South on similar testimony. The great fault that the Senator has made is to have located his outrage at all. He should have left it an unassigned and an unlocated and an unpatented outrage floating about somewhere in the South; left it as he left it the other day when he attributed it to Mississippi, and when, in answer to the challenge of the Senator from Mississippi, he declined to say what the name of the party was, where his property was located, what his property was, when it was burnt, where it was burnt, how it was burnt, or to give any particulars whatever. I submit, Mr. President, that he had better have left this case in a similar condition. Then his statement could not have been riddled by contradiction as it has been.

Mr. President, as is well known, the people of Louisiana, who are now entering upon a career of great prosperity, desired above all things an influx of white emigration. They welcome it; so far from meeting the emigrants coldly, so far from molesting or interfering with them, they welcome them, as I have had occasion to say before on this floor, and now repeat again, with open arms. They would welcome a million of them, even if they all came from Massachusetts, or Vermont, or Connecticut, or Rhode Island, no matter if they were all republicans in politics. They would welcome them to their neighborhoods, welcome them to their society, welcome them to the use of their property, welcome them to the enjoyment of every right which they themselves possess, and rejoice in the prosperity that should result from this emigration to our beautiful State. But, Mr. President, if we do not get this emigration, if the people of Massachusetts and Connecticut and Rhode Island and the East are kept away from us, they are kept away by such malicious and calumnious slanders as those to which I am now responding, which might of themselves perhaps fall harmless, but which repeated on this floor day after day by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] and the honorable Senator from Maine, [Mr. FRYE,] made part of their remarks, stamped with their approval, and franked by them to their constituents, may well alarm those constituents, who have been in the habit of placing confidence in their utterances, and cause them to refrain from risking their lives and fortunes by emigrating to this rich, fruitful, and peaceful but misrepresented land.

However powerful the influence of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts may be, however gladly the people of his State may follow his advice and accept his statements, I do not find that such wild statements as this of Mr. Heath which he indorsed without investigation, without examination, when it was in many particulars directly the opposite of what he had stated on this floor, apparently from personal communication with Mr. Heath—I do not find, I say, that all the papers and all the people of Massachusetts seem to accept the statement even with his indorsement. I have in my hands the Boston Journal, which I believe is a republican paper. I will ask the honorable Senator if it is not a republican paper. With the exception of the article which I am about to read, its editorials are devoted to denouncing the Bourbon democrats in the Senate for the course they are at present pursuing, with a brief laudation of the speech made by the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] a few days ago. This paper (which the Senator admits to be a republican journal) says:

A FEW QUERIES FOR MR. CHARLES HEATH.

The story which Mr. Charles Heath, of Malden, communicated to the public yesterday through the columns of the Advertiser had the appearance of being a carefully prepared statement; and it is safe to assume that Mr. Heath, being a shrewd and intelligent man of business, would not have published it without being prepared to verify the assertions made in it, and to answer such inquiries as were pretty sure to be suggested by it. Events of so disagreeable a character as those which he narrates must have made a pretty deep impression upon his mind, and it is with some disappointment that we find his statement, which cannot be complained of on the score of length, somewhat deficient as to definiteness of dates. There occur to us some points of interest in connection with the narrative which appear to have been overlooked by Mr. Heath, but concerning which he may be willing to enlighten the public.

When Mr. Heath's case was referred to by Mr. DAWES in the Senate it was stated that his employés had been murdered, that he had had to put iron shutters on the houses of his workmen to provide for their safety at night, and that when he departed he had left behind him three or four hundred men and their families, who would have to seek a livelihood elsewhere. In Mr. Heath's narrative we miss the episode of the iron shutters; we find that none of his employés were murdered, though one was wounded; and we find that he left behind him but eleven families, and these cannot be in a wholly desperate condition, as they are now paying rent. Will Mr. Heath tell us whether, when he told his story in Washington, he put into it some details which he omitted in his narrative in the Advertiser?

Mr. Heath places his first difficulties, the assault upon the negro Harris, &c., as occurring "along in 1877 or 1878." These dates are noticeably vague; but will Mr. Heath tell us what congressional investigating committee was taking evidence in Louisiana after these dates, and at whose summons Harris appeared to testify of his wrongs?

Mr. Heath took the story of his grievances to Governor Warmoth, and he gives a report of his conversation with the governor. Is Mr. Heath quite sure that it was Governor Warmoth to whom he went? And if so, will he explain how it was that he happened to go to a man whose term of office as governor had expired at least four years before the alleged grievances occurred?

Is Mr. Heath positive that the wrongs of which he was the victim had a political motive, or were directed against him simply as a northerner? Does not his own narrative assert that his white neighbors were as ready to shoot each other as to shoot him? Were there any business quarrels or difficulties which might furnish an explanation for the assaults?

Mr. Heath's property was consumed on Christmas night. What are his reasons, precisely, for thinking that the fire was of incendiary origin, and that white men set it for the purpose of cleaning him out? How does he account for the subsidence of persecutions from the first date, "along in 1877 or 1878" to Christmas, 1880?

Finally, has Mr. Heath any recollection of telling to his friends at the North a story essentially the same as that just published, except as to the burning of his property, quite a number of years ago—say ten or a dozen; and that his story, as then told, included the shooting of Harris, and the note of warning with its special selection of "old Gould"—although he places these episodes now no further back than "along in 1877 or 1878?"

These are a few queries which we desire to submit to Mr. Heath's consideration, in the hope of clearing up some points in his narrative which seem to us obscure, and of relieving certain ambiguities of date. Let Mr. Heath refresh his memory, and elucidate the matters to which we solicit his attention.

I will only remark that it is strange that these difficulties did not present themselves to the mind of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts. He did not, like the editor of the Boston Journal, find discrepancies between what Mr. Heath had told him in Washington or elsewhere and what Mr. Heath published in the Boston Advertiser, but hastened to indorse what he intimated Mr. Heath had told him in private conversation fastening his charges upon Mississippi; and when Mr. Heath changed the field and changed his account in the narration published in the Boston Advertiser, he with equal alacrity adopted that, made it part of his remarks, gave it full indorsement, and submitted it to the Senate and to the people of the country.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator from Louisiana I suppose has an impression that the statements which have been made by him will be accepted as the truth about the affair which happened in Caldwell Parish. I have nothing to say upon the question whether he will be disappointed or not. So far as the Senator has alluded to me, he seems to desire to make the impression that I was disingenuous and undertook to locate the transaction in the State of Mississippi for the purposes of the then debate when I had some reason to suppose that it never transpired in Mississippi, and he has been kind enough to intimate that I would be likely to move it to some other State, and that the great mistake in me was that I located it at all. All those insinuations from the Senator from Louisiana I do not deign to take any notice of; the Senator is welcome to all he can make by them.

The Senate records will show that I stated frankly to the Senate at the time I made the first statement that I held in my hand, furnished me by one of my colleagues in the other House in whom I had confidence, a piece of paper upon which was written the place where this thing transpired; and when I learned that it was a mistake, and the first moment that it came to my knowledge that instead of happening in Mississippi it happened the other side of the river in Louisiana, with the same piece of paper in my hand which I had previously presented to the Senator from Mississippi, (that I might assure him if he had any doubt, not knowing me very well, that I was entirely sincere,) I made the correction. I then said that I desired Mr. Heath's own statement to go upon the RECORD that he might answer for himself. I also stated then how much I knew about it, that these facts were communicated to me by my colleague in whom I had confidence and in whom I still have confidence; that this gentleman, with my colleague—I speak of my colleague in the other House, my colleague in the Senate did not know anything of it—had made an appointment to see me, but he was not able to keep it, having been obliged to leave on the cars, and I did not see him. So the Senator knew when he made the statement a moment ago that I had told the Senate I did not see this man at all.

The Senator, with the help of the Boston Journal, has been able to make some statements in reference to dates. I have not seen the Boston Advertiser of the same day, but there is a telegram in the papers this morning saying, I do not know how correctly, that the Boston Advertiser has corrected some typographical mistakes in the dates in the communication it previously published. Whether they are these or not I do not know; but it is perfectly apparent upon reading the paper that there was a mistake about dates. I do not know whether they relieve Mr. Heath or relieve the Senator.

After having stated the source of my information and put on record the statement of Mr. Heath himself, as I said when I put it upon the record, I transfer the controversy between the Senator from Louisiana and myself to Mr. Heath. I understand, what I was about to inquire of him from his further statement, that the Mr. Edward Heath of whom he spoke had been the partner of Mr. Charles Heath, Mr. Charles Heath transacting the business in Caldwell Parish, and it turns out now that at the present time the record title of the property carried on by this partnership is in Mr. Edward Heath. I understand Mr. Edward Heath—the Senator will correct me if I am mistaken—is a merchant in New Orleans and has been for twenty-five or thirty years, and that he was the military mayor of the city of New Orleans when it was taken possession of by our people.

Mr. JONAS. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. DAWES. I may have been mistaken.

Mr. JONAS. He was not the mayor when the military took possession of the city, but he was appointed mayor by General Sheridan when he removed the civil officers and appointed military officers. He appointed him long after the war.

Mr. DAWES. Long after the war, when the real character of men was known, tried in the war and tried after the war, known more thoroughly than during the war, this gentleman was selected by General Sheridan and made mayor of the city. He is there now, a merchant of standing and character. Just before the Senator rose, I was called to yonder door by a gentleman I knew in the other House, who said he had done business for twenty years in New Orleans, up to within two years of this time, constantly with Mr. Edward Heath, the partner of Mr. Charles Heath, and he bore the amplest and the fullest testimony to his integrity of character in every respect. I do not know him. I give him and his brother, whose statement is on the record and who must abide by it, the benefit of this testimony along with that which I gave yesterday.

Having given the source of all the information I had, frankly and fully to the Senate, I leave the question to the Senator to settle with those two Messrs. Heath, with this additional remark: The Senator intimated yesterday that a certain judge in that parish had communicated the fact that he had not got testimony enough to indict the man yet, but he would have it before July, I think it was; and he has read a long communication from that judge, who proposes to try this man. I have only to say, that I thank God I do not live myself where I could be tried by such a judge. I can see some reason why it would be wise to keep out of the jurisdiction of such a man, however high his character may be considered to be among those with whom he lives. If a judge who proposes to try men accused of crime can, according to my notions of what becomes a judge, so far forget himself and his duty as to put himself upon record in the manner the Senator from Louisiana has been so anxious to put this judge, I only repeat, the Lord have mercy on me if I ever come before such a judge.

The Senator may make such comments as he pleases upon the statement of Mr. Heath or of the connection Mr. Heath has with the record title, or with the value of that title, or anything he pleases. Until he convicts me of a want of entire frankness with the Senate in communicating not only all the information I had but the sources from whence it came, I shall not trouble myself to reply to him any more.

Mr. JONAS. The Senator from Massachusetts did not have the manliness to come out and admit that the statements which he had made upon hearsay were unfounded, and that he had not the evidence to sustain them, or if he had (as he said he does now) remitted this question between this Mr. Heath and his brother and myself to my people to settle, there would have been no need for me to have taken the trouble which I have done to expose the utter falsity of nearly every statement made in the communication which he furnished to the Senate. I was called upon to notice it because the Senator has spread it before the country, because he sought to introduce it into the Senate and into political discussion, because he sought, not to right the wrongs of Mr. Heath, if he has suffered any, but to blacken the reputation of Louisiana and her citizens before the American Senate and the American people.

The honorable Senator says that he has treated this matter with entire frankness; that there is nothing he has stated which has not been borne out. I will only occupy one moment in calling attention to the Senator's remarks, made on the 1st of April, which produced this whole discussion and this investigation:

Only the day before yesterday—

Said the Senator on April 1—

Only the day before yesterday there passed through this city on his way to the North, in which he could enjoy his own convictions, a venerable gray-headed man, who, trusting to these words that he had but to know the people of Mississippi better in order to love them more, took his capital, took his wife and his children and his energy and his hope and his future, thirteen years ago, down into the Senator's State to build up a home, to build up a business, and enlarge the opportunities of men in that State to earn a livelihood and to better their condition and to build for themselves homes and school-houses and churches and towns; and faithfully and industriously, and devoted exclusively to such a great undertaking as that, that old gray-headed man has labored and labored on, hoped on and hoped on, but he was persecuted until he was obliged to put iron shutters on the windows of the houses of his workmen that they might sleep in safety at night, his factories were burned, his employés were murdered, his enterprises were thwarted at every step; not even exercising what we at the North have a notion is an inalienable right, to assert our political principles wherever we are, not even doing that, never having entered a political meeting or cast a vote, but sternly standing by the faith of his fathers, which sooner than give up he would burn at the stake, he resolved that he would give up no conviction of his, political or otherwise, and in this struggle he has at last given over, and taking what little is left of that hopeless enterprise of his, and leaving three or four hundred men with their families whom he had employed these thirteen years to seek a livelihood elsewhere, or migrate to your State, sir, [Mr. INGALLS in the chair,] or to the State of the Senator from Indiana, or some other place, he has gone North, and the North will listen to him before they will ask the Senator from Mississippi to repeat again here his platitudes about North and South. Sir, this is not the only orator that comes North.

I had a right to suppose that in passing through Washington this gray-haired man had whispered his communication to the Senator. These charges which he makes now and which I have disproved to-day are not the charges that the Senator made here on this floor. Whatever of report has gone North, if it speaks trumpet-tongued to the people of the North, it is not because it is made by Mr. Heath, whose character I have shown up to-day, but because it is made by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts in his place, representing the people of a great Commonwealth and himself one of the leaders of a great party. It is he who slanders the people against whom these calumnies have been sent forth, not the humble instrument whom he indorses and whom he dignifies.

The honorable Senator thanks God that his lot is not cast and that he has not to live in the community in which this parish is located, and which is presided over by the honorable judge whose testimony I have read. I think without any disrespect to the Senator that after reading these speeches and this evidence and what the Senator has said to-day, those people will join the Senator in grateful thanks that his lot has not been cast among them, and that in the dispensations of a kind Providence no such misfortune awaits them.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, in my remarks made a few days since in this Chamber I was discussing the question of the propriety of our remaining here as we now do and preventing the passage of the resolution introduced by the Senator from Massachusetts. During those remarks I referred to the fact that having the impression we had about the transactions connected with the nomination of these officers we could not properly yield. I said we were willing to refer this question to the people and take their judgment as to whether we are right or the other side is right. I then referred to the fact that in my opinion a very large majority of the people sustained us; that the democratic press with great unanimity sustained us, and that the republican press was divided; that republican papers had said some very hard things about what has been called the contract with Senator MAHONE. I did not affirm that there was any contract, but I stated what some republican papers had said; and I used one or two pretty strong expressions, I believe. The honorable Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. BURNSIDE] took issue upon my remarks, and while he agreed that some republican papers had found fault, he said in substance that they were changing their views and now approving the course of republican Senators; and he denied that any republican paper had spoken of it as a corrupt or improper contract or bargain, as I understood him. I have not the language before me, but that was it substantially.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Let me correct the Senator. I said unless he could name the papers I would make the denial; I had seen no such thing. I said I denied it unless he could name the papers; and he could not name the papers.

Mr. BROWN. The Senator is right. He asked me to name the paper——

Mr. BURNSIDE. The papers.

Mr. BROWN. And I said I was not able to do so at the time because I did not remember what paper had said it; but I was very sure I had seen it in what was called a republican paper; and then said I would try to look up the papers. That is the reason why I now trouble the Senate for a few moments. The Senate will bear me out when I say that it has not been my custom to introduce matters of this sort to go upon the record, and I do not care to make a practice of it; but under those circumstances I feel that I am justified, and not only justified but that it is my duty to do it in defense of the position which I took at that time, which I understand to be controverted.

I shall therefore send to the desk several extracts from papers, naming the paper in each case; and if any Senator on the floor denies that the paper named is a republican paper, especially if either of the Senators from the State deny it, then I will withdraw it, or I will have it read not as a republican paper; in other words, if I undertake to read from a paper that the republican Senators from the State will say is not a republican paper, I will leave it for the Senators and the paper to settle that question, and I will not urge it here as a republican authority in the teeth of a denial by a republican Senator that it is such, for I do not know myself that some of them are such, and I do not wish to do any injustice. The first I propose to read from is the Boston Herald.

Mr. BURNSIDE. The Boston Herald is an independent paper; that is not republican.

Mr. BROWN. Is it more republican or more democratic?

Mr. BURNSIDE. I should say it was rather more democratic. That is my opinion of it; the Senators from Massachusetts will know more particularly.

Mr. BROWN. I prefer that the Senators from Massachusetts should take issue that it is not a republican paper. If they choose to say it is not a republican paper, I have no objection.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator appeals to me, I desire to say that this eking out of the debating capacity of Senators by bringing in here extracts from newspapers criticising the conduct of members of this body is so utterly repugnant and disgusting to my sense of decency that I am not going to wade into it by having any——

Mr. BROWN. I do not ask the opinion of the Senator from Massachusetts on that question.

Mr. HOAR. I state the reason for declining.

Mr. BROWN. I think the Senator's colleague has had some reading done; it was rather long and I believe a little expensive to him too. If I recollect correctly the honorable Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] has had some extracts from newspapers read here. I may be mistaken; that is my recollection.

Mr. HOAR. Extracts from newspapers discussing the conduct of Senators or parties in the Senate, or members of the Senate? Never.

Mr. BROWN. I did not say what they were discussing. I have a right to read them in the line of the argument I am making, while you have the same right in any argument you may make. I have given the reasons to the Senate and to the country why I read these extracts, and I shall still claim that the Boston Herald is a republican paper until one of the Senators from Massachusetts denies that it is.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I deny it, Mr. President.

Mr. BROWN. I do not appeal to the Senator from Rhode Island on that question. I think the Senators from Massachusetts are better authority on that question, and with all due deference to the Senator from Rhode Island I prefer their opinion on the subject. If they say it is not a republican paper, I will of course not insist on it.

Mr. McMILLAN. If the Senator from Georgia will allow me, does he not propose to read here extracts from what he says are republican papers?

Mr. BROWN. That is just what I propose to do.

Mr. McMILLAN. In support of his statement the other day?

Mr. BROWN. I said if the republican Senators from the State stated that a paper from which an extract was taken is not a republican paper I would not read it, or if I did I would not read it as from a republican paper. I do not ask the Senators from other States to interfere with this matter. I am dealing just now with Massachusetts. If I should reach the State of the honorable Senator now on the floor, the State of Minnesota, I will then very cheerfully call on him.

Mr. McMILLAN. I was not referring to the particular extract about to be read; I was merely endeavoring to ascertain from the Senator from Georgia whether we are to understand when he reads an extract from a newspaper in support of his former position, that the republican papers were denouncing this side of the Chamber as being engaged in an attempt to carry out a corrupt bargain, he reads now from what he declares to be republican papers.

Mr. BROWN. Yes, sir, that is just what I propose.

Mr. McMILLAN. Very well; then we shall understand it.

Mr. BROWN. I said I was not sure in each case whether it was a republican paper; and as I was very anxious to do no injustice about it, I said if a republican Senator from the State would deny that it was a republican paper I would not read the extract, or if I did read it I would read it with the statement that it was not from a republican paper. The first I called on the list was the Boston Herald. The next is the Hartford Courant. I send the two extracts to the Clerk's desk and ask the Clerk to read them.

Mr. BURNSIDE. In regard to the extract from the Boston Herald I desire to state and to place on record that the Boston Herald is an independent paper, and if I had to give my opinion I would say that it is more democratic than republican. If the Senator now chooses, in view of what he announced, to have the extract read, I have no objection. If he thinks that is a proper way to conduct a discussion, I have nothing to say.

Mr. BROWN. Under the rule which I have laid down, with all due deference to the Senator from Rhode Island, I shall have the extract read unless one of the Senators from Massachusetts will say that it is not a republican paper.

Mr. BURNSIDE. The Senator from Georgia can lay down rules, and we can have our opinion as to the propriety of them.

Mr. BROWN. The rule I laid down was that I would take the opinion of a republican Senator from the State. When I reach Rhode Island I will ask the opinion of my honorable friend.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Then the Senator from Georgia is to be the autocrat of the Senate as to what shall be read. The Senator from Georgia stated distinctly that he would read extracts from republican papers.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, in the chair.) The Senator from Georgia has the floor and cannot be interrupted without his consent.

Mr. BROWN. I have not misstated the case. I said that I did not know in each case whether it was a republican paper, and in any case if a republican Senator from the State where it was located would say it was not a republican paper, I would not have it read as an extract from a republican paper. Both the Senators from Massachusetts have declined to state that the Boston Herald is not a republican paper. I have not asked the Senator from Rhode Island whether it is; he can make his own comments about that, but the Senators from Massachusetts do not deny that it is a republican paper.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I do, Mr. President.

Mr. BROWN. You deny for them that which they will not deny for themselves.

Mr. BURNSIDE. There are twenty-five men right around me here all of whom think that I am right and that the Senator from Georgia is wrong.

Mr. BROWN. The Senator will permit me to say that that is outside of his State, and the Senators from the State had better make an issue in regard to that journal than other Senators not in the State. Let the extract be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

[From the Boston Herald.]

WASHINGTON, April 13.

Another important matter particularly interesting to the Pacific coast is the ratification of the Chinese treaties. The commissioners returned last fall with a treaty restricting Chinese emigration, and another defining certain new commercial relations not previously existing between the countries. The former instrument will probably cause a somewhat extended debate, and may have to be recommitted for modification before it is acceptable to the Senate. It defines the class to be prohibited as laborers, and does not specify whether this shall be construed to include the skilled labor of artisans, such as cigar and boot and shoe makers, or not. Again, no mention is made of females, which is an oversight in the opinion of some Senators. The Californians are very desirous to have the matter settled before the summer emigration sets in. These are a few of the reasons urged why the dead-lock should be dissolved as soon as possible.

[From the Hartford Courant.]

There is apparently no reason why the democrats should abandon the course they have adopted in filibustering against the election of Clerk and Sergeant-at-Arms. Neither can they be said to be obstructing the regular business when they offer every day to go into executive session. If the struggle over the offices is to continue, it would certainly be wise to confine it to the usual hours of the daily session and not allow it to interfere with regular executive sessions. It is to be hoped that some such conclusion will be reached.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I did not hear the whole of the extract. I should like to ask the Senator from Georgia if that article charges any corrupt bargain?

Mr. BROWN. No, I do not think it does; but there are some more behind that have not been read. If the Senator will wait until I get through he may change his opinion.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I wish to make the point on that article that it contains no charge of a corrupt bargain, which proves that thus far I was right.

Mr. BROWN. I say I do not think that it does; but if we find some others as we go along that should, I may ask your opinion then about them and see whether we can agree.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Though it is immaterial whether the paper is republican or independent.

Mr. BROWN. I next send to the desk an extract from the American, of Philadelphia, which I understand to be a republican paper.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

[From the American.]

The plain truth is that Mr. MAHONE was elected to the Senate by democrats and as a democrat, and never professed to be anything else until this debate. It is true that he needed and received some republican votes; but these were given him for a price, which was paid, and that bargain was closed. His faction of the party indorsed the nomination of General Hancock, and put before the people a list of electors pledged to vote for him. It is not so long since these very newspapers and Senators would have resented as slanderous the insinuation that they had any affiliation with Mr. MAHONE or he with them, and would have used language as strong as that employed in this debate by Senator HILL and other southerners.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Will the Senator allow me to ask him if the last extract read contains a charge of a corrupt bargain?

Mr. BROWN. I do not know that it does exactly; but it contains a charge that I think has something in it that looks a little wrong. I next send to the desk an extract from the Sacramento Record-Union, a paper published at Sacramento, California, an extract from the Denver Tribune, of Colorado, and one from the Portland Daily Oregonian, of Oregon.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

[Sacramento Record-Union, (republican,) April 4.]

The whole Mahone business is productive of nothing but mischief. It has long been apparent that the republican Senators had made a fatal blunder in trafficking with the Virginia repudiator and turncoat. Had their purpose been in any way a respectable one the country might not have viewed the proceedings so severely, but when it is considered that all this humiliation and degradation has been incurred for the sake of fixing an indelible insult upon the republican party of California, not to speak of the result upon the national party of putting such a man as Gorham in a post of honor and responsibility, the whole incident seems fatuous and perverse in the extreme.

[Denver Tribune, (republican,) April 7.]

The humiliating spectacle of the United States Senate squabbling for days over the appointment of a Doorkeeper and a Secretary is still being continued, with the usual detail of small squabbling. There may be a great principle involved in the struggle somewhere, but if so it is done up in a very small wrapper. It can hardly be called a party question, since neither Riddleberger nor Gorham is a party man. The one is a Virginia repudiationist and the other stumped against the last republican State ticket in California.

[Portland Daily Oregonian, (republican,) March 30.]

It now seems probable that the Senate will never be organized till Gorham is "bounced." This whole squabble, so far beneath the dignity of the Senate, was worked up by him in order to get the fat place of Secretary of that body. Gorham is one of the professional gamblers in politics who ought to be sat upon whenever they begin to stir.

Mr. BROWN. The word "traffic" there, I will remark to the honorable Senator from Rhode Island, rather squints at the idea I spoke of; it does not exactly charge it, though.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I notice those extracts are from papers published on the Pacific coast and papers that could not have reached here probably at the time of which the Senator spoke. I certainly am not familiar with them.

Mr. BROWN. Possibly we may find more that is said on the Pacific coast.

Mr. BURNSIDE. The Record-Union, I am informed by the Senator from California, [Mr. MILLER,] is an independent paper.

Mr. BROWN. If the Senator from California will say it does not support the republican ticket——

Mr. MILLER. If the Senator will allow me, I will say that the Record-Union is an independent paper. It sometimes supports the republican ticket, and when it does not choose to do so it bolts it; but it might be classed as an independent paper with republican proclivities. The editor, I believe, is a republican.

Mr. FARLEY. I have no disposition to get into this controversy, but I want to say that this is the first time I ever knew the Sacramento Record-Union to be called an independent paper. My colleague knows better than I do, I suppose; but the paper has universally, since it has been a paper, supported the republican national ticket; and I have never known a contest in the State when it did not have at the head of its columns the names of the candidates nominated by the republican party. In 1875 there was a division in the republican party in that State. One wing of the party was headed by Messrs. Gorham and Sargent; the other wing was headed by Governor Bidwell and Newton Booth. The Sacramento Record-Union at that time did occupy a sort of supervision over both parties, but recognized the regular republican nominees as those who were entitled to be supported by the republican party. It has at no time failed to support the republican nominees of the party for President and the whole of the republican ticket since I have known anything about the paper.

I submit the question to my colleague if the Sacramento Record-Union has not been a consistent supporter of the republican party in that State? I claim that it has been, and I regret that it is so, for it is a very able paper; but it has pursued that course, as I understand, invariably. It very often expresses, as other newspapers do, independent sentiments; but invariably it supports the republican party organization. It has quarreled with its party frequently for the course that the party should have pursued, but it has been universally recognized as a republican paper. I apprehend there is not a correspondent on this side of the mountains who does not recognize the Sacramento Record-Union as a republican paper belonging to the Associated Press of the country. It was a warm supporter of General Garfield, a warm supporter of Mr. Hayes, and has been an advocate of the republican party ever since I have known anything about its organization. To say that the paper is independent because it sometimes expresses independent views, while always at elections it supports the regular ticket, may be reconciled, and still it may be an independent paper yet a positive, known, outspoken republican paper.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. FARLEY. Certainly; with a great deal of pleasure.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I wish to know if in 1867 that paper did not support the democratic candidate for governor?

Mr. FARLEY. I can say to my friend from Rhode Island that if that paper had an existence at all in 1867 (I am not positive as to that) it supported Mr. George C. Gorham, the republican nominee, for governor. My recollection is that the Record-Union was not then in existence; but there was the old Sacramento Union, which went out of existence. The Record-Union, which has carried on its own organization, has always been a republican paper. The old Sacramento Union and the Sacramento Record-Union are two different papers entirely. The old Sacramento Union was an independent paper except at presidential elections, when it always supported the republican ticket, but it opposed Mr. Gorham in 1867; but not the Sacramento Record-Union. They are two different institutions entirely.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I should like to ask the Senator whether this paper supported him or opposed him for the Senate.

Mr. FARLEY. It opposed me.

Mr. BURNSIDE. It opposed you?

Mr. FARLEY. I should say it did. It was a republican paper.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Are not the owners of the paper friends of the Senator?

Mr. FARLEY. I do not know who the owners of the paper are.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I do not know myself.

Mr. MILLER. I wish to make a statement, if the Senator from Georgia will allow me.

Mr. BROWN. Certainly.

Mr. MILLER. While what the Senator says about its being a republican paper and supporting the national republican ticket is true, so far as that goes, it is a paper the editor of which and the managers of which pride themselves upon their independence. It has so happened that in the last two elections the nominees of the republican party have been such men with such platforms as met their approval and their judgment, and they supported them; but it is in all essential particulars an independent paper. I do not know that it is important to state here exactly the status of that newspaper. I do not know that this is a trial by newspaper. When an argument is made I do not know that it makes any difference whether it is made in a republican or a democratic paper; we must take the argument for what it is worth in itself.

Mr. FARLEY. Will my colleague allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MILLER. Yes, sir.

Mr. FARLEY. At the last election did not this paper and all its proprietors support the entire republican ticket in the State of California including the members of the Legislature that elected my colleague to the Senate?

Mr. MILLER. I believe it did, and it did so because acting as independent journalists they thought they were supporting the best side, which they evidently were doing.

Mr. BROWN. I believe, then, after the statements already made, that I shall insist on having the articles clipped from this paper go into the RECORD. As it is stated that in every instance it supports the republican candidates, I think it must be classed as a republican paper. The republican Senator from the State says it is independent enough sometimes to speak what it thinks, and that seems to be the condition of it just now. Its editors seem to believe that there is something very wrong in the course of the republican Senators here, and although a strong republican paper and an able one, it speaks out and condemns that wrong. It therefore has a right to be heard. I will next send to the Clerk's desk and have read an article from the Evening Telegraph, of Philadelphia.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Will the Senator allow me to ask him to please state whether these are statements of correspondents or editorials?

Mr. BROWN. They are taken from the editorials.

Mr. BURNSIDE. All of them?

Mr. BROWN. That is my understanding. I did not clip them all myself, but I am informed by those who did that they were. I intend to read no others if I know it.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Commenting on the alliance between Senator MAHONE and the republican Senators, the Philadelphia Evening Telegraph (republican) says: "In Virginia MAHONE rests all hopes of success upon a republican alliance, without which, backed up by the whole power of the national organization and of the Administration, the repudiation cause is doomed to overwhelming defeat. In a word, the legitimate end of this unholy alliance of spoils-grabbers, into which the real republicans in the Senate have been led through the caucus, like ring-nosed animals, will be to load the republican party of the nation with the worst and most blighting species of financial odium, fitly termed by the leading republican journals of New York 'naked dishonesty.'"

Mr. BROWN. I beg leave to call the attention of the honorable Senator from Rhode Island to the fact that this paper terms it an "unholy alliance."

Mr. BURNSIDE. I beg leave to call the attention of the Senator from Georgia to the statement of the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. MITCHELL,] that this is not a republican paper.

Mr. BROWN. If he states that, then I shall not insist that that much of it is republican authority. I will ask the Senators from Pennsylvania how that is. I want to leave the matter to be settled between the Senators from the State and the paper.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I should like to ask the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. MITCHELL] whether that is a republican paper or not?

Mr. MITCHELL. I do not know why I should be called upon to give testimony in this case. I believe I have already given evidence in it, and I see no reason to change my opinion.

Mr. BURNSIDE. What did the Senator state, if he thinks proper to repeat it?

Mr. MITCHELL. I stated some days ago that if this were a republican paper it was one with democratic tendencies, and I have seen no reason to change my opinion. I have formed that opinion from a pretty careful reading of the paper for some years, and not from any personal acquaintance with the proprietors. I have observed so far in my life that newspapers in many instances express simply an individual opinion, and that in very many cases where they differ with a great organization which has the opportunity for counsel and the advantage of a cultivation of the sentiment of the country, such an individual opinion is more frequently in error than that of a community or organization.

Mr. BROWN. Will the honorable Senator permit me to inquire of him whether this paper usually supports the democratic or republican candidates at elections?

Mr. MITCHELL. I can say in reply that I have known of instances where it supported the democratic candidates. For instance, in the late senatorial contest at Harrisburgh it supported on one occasion the late Senator from Pennsylvania, Mr. Wallace, for Senator.

Mr. BROWN. Which side does it usually support in elections?

Mr. MITCHELL. It supported also the liberal or independent candidate for Senator, my late colleague in the House of Representatives, Colonel Bayne, of Allegheny.

Mr. BROWN. Will the honorable Senator please inform me which side it ordinarily supports?

Mr. MITCHELL. Indeed I do not know that I could testify as to that. I think it opposed the regular republican candidates at the recent municipal election in Philadelphia.

Mr. BROWN. How was it in the last presidential campaign?

Mr. MITCHELL. I think it supported the republican candidate. I suppose I am under cross-examination now.

Mr. BROWN. Then I will leave it on the record with that statement.

Mr. MITCHELL. I wish to say in this connection, if I may be permitted, that the Evening Telegraph is a paper for the opinions of which in many cases I have a very high respect, as I have for the opinions of many other independent papers in the country, as I have for those of individuals in many cases; but where it gets on the wrong track, and I find myself differing with it, I certainly cannot subscribe to its opinions.

Mr. BROWN. I will next send to the desk an extract from the Hartford Courant, of Connecticut.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

[From the Hartford Courant, April 14.]

Unfortunately, the republicans are at a disadvantage; for the democrats are any hour ready to go into executive session, and cannot, therefore, in the strict view of the case, be accused of blocking the public business, or of opposing the administration. * * * There has, however, one difficulty recently arisen that puts a somewhat humorous aspect on the case. MAHONE can't get a pair! He alone of all the Senators is obliged to stay there day after day. The democrats will none of them pair with him unless he will avow himself a republican formally. * * * The republicans have undertaken something they cannot carry through; the only extrication for them is to loosen the chains of caucus, and let individuals vote as they choose on the question of executive sessions. It is childish to complain of the democrats when reports come of delay and damage to public business because the President's appointments are not confirmed. * * * There is no way but for republican Senators to accept the facts. And the sooner they do it the better. It is very suspicious that the delay, after all, of going into executive session arises from a section of the republican Senators who want to thwart the President. And if that is true, the state of things is simply intolerable. They are not masters of the situation, and should no longer hesitate. We understand the importance of the fight. It may be that the inauguration of a new era of politics depends upon it. But it seems quite possible for the Senate to go into executive session and confirm the necessary and undisputed appointments, and then continue their fight for the organization of the Senate until December if necessary.

Mr. HAWLEY. I want to say for the gentleman's comfort that that is a republican paper. It is not always quite right in my absence, but it is a very sound republican paper.

Mr. BURNSIDE. And it does not accuse us of a corrupt bargain.

Mr. BROWN. I see it does not. We will try another. I will return to the Pacific slope again, and I will ask that an extract be read from the San Francisco Argonaut. I understand the editor is Mr. Frank Pixley, who was a member of the last republican convention at Chicago.

Mr. HAWLEY. And he stands by it, which the Senator does not do.

Mr. BROWN. I was not a member of the last one, nor of the one before that nor of the one before that.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

The very disgraceful bargain between republican Senators and the democratic traitor from Virginia has been consummated. "Black-and-tan" is to be Secretary of the Senate, and one of MAHONE'S followers is to be Sergeant-at-Arms. This is the most open, most disgraceful, and most damaging political bargain that has ever been consummated in American politics. It is very small and very contemptible business, and ought to do the republicans harm in the opinion of all honorable and honest men.

Mr. BROWN. The language there I will call the attention of the honorable Senator from Rhode Island to is a "very disgraceful bargain;" it does not say "corrupt."

Mr. BURNSIDE. I believe that paper is published by a personal enemy of Mr. Gorham. The Senator from California [Mr. MILLER] says it is not a republican paper, and he is the authority in this case.

Mr. MILLER. The paper edited by Mr. Pixley is a literary paper.

Mr. BROWN. Was not the editor a member of the last republican convention at Chicago?

Mr. MILLER. Yes, sir.

Mr. BROWN. Did not his paper support the republican candidate for the Presidency?

Mr. MILLER. It did in a certain way.

Mr. BROWN. Then if it did, it is republican enough for my purpose.

Mr. MILLER. The editor, I will inform the Senator, was a democrat, or supported Mr. Greeley for the Presidency when he ran. It is not a political paper, although occasionally articles of a political character appear in it. It is independent in politics, in religion, literature, finance, and everything else.

Mr. BROWN. I have known a good number of that sort of independent papers, but they usually come home to one side when they are to give their support; and as the editor of this paper was a member of the convention that nominated the last republican candidate for the Presidency, and as the paper supported him, I think it is worth while to have the extract read. I will next send to the desk and ask to have read an extract from the Pittsburgh Dispatch of Pennsylvania, if that is not objected to as not being a republican paper.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

[From the Pittsburgh Dispatch, republican.]

The great trouble with the average thick-and-thin party organ is that it has zeal without judgment, and inclination divested of knowledge to govern it. In its narrow vision whatever the party to which it owes allegiance does is right, and every enormity committed by the bosses upon whose pleasure its life depends at once takes on the sanctity of inspiration.

Under these conditions it is not surprising that all the party organs join in the chorus approving the disgraceful bargain with MAHONE. That it involves a sacrifice of every principle that has marked the success of the republican party makes no difference to the party organ, so long as it is commanded to pipe forth its ambiguous praise. That it implies a disgraceful and dishonorable alliance with despicable characters is a matter of no concern. Maintained upon the fruits of plunder and the drippings from official patronage, it has grown callous to all sentiments of patriotism and considerations of virtue.

Mr. BROWN. I call the attention of the honorable Senator from Rhode Island to the fact that this article speaks of it as a "disgraceful bargain" and a "dishonorable alliance."

Mr. BURNSIDE. As its own opinion? I should like to know whether it is the language of a correspondent or an editorial. I shall take them up in turn and find out how many are correspondents' articles and how many are editorials.

Mr. BROWN. That is right; I have no disposition to misstate. I desire to have another article read from the same paper, the Dispatch, and from the heading there, as it is the usual editorial heading, I do not see that it is from a correspondent at all. There are certain portions of the article that relate to another matter that I have run the pen through. I only desire the parts read that bear on this transaction.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

THE SENATORIAL DEAD-LOCK.

At an early stage of the disgraceful contest now waging for possession of the paste-pots of the United States Senate the Dispatch expressed its deprecation of the movement and pointed out that the real purpose of maintaining the dead-lock was concealed under an ostensible pretense of disrupting the political solidity of the South. To any sincere motion looking to such a consummation we would give cheerful and enthusiastic support under the conviction that it would contribute to the peace and fraternity of the whole country, but the thin veneering of patriotism which glossed over the cheap buncombe that animated the actors in this comedy was so transparent as to expose its naked and palpable dishonesty. Fully satisfied, therefore, of insincerity on the part of republican Senators, and repelled by the dishonor which a coalition with unrepentant rebels, democratic repudiators, and disreputable adventurers would impose upon the republican party, intelligent and independent journals had no alternative but to first expose and then denounce it as both unclean and unholy.

* * * * * * *

The truth is the matter is so palpable that only the most dense obtuseness, or that equally potent agent of imbecility, partisan blindness, is sufficient to obscure it. The facts are these: The Senate assembled on Friday, March 4. On the following Tuesday the democratic Senators presented their resolution for the reorganization of the Senate committees. Owing to vacancies caused by death and resignations there was a clear majority of democrats in the body. The opposition Senators rightly insisted that it was unfair to organize the committees until after the vacancies had been filled, and with remarkable unanimity agreed that the only business in order was executive business. In this way, by dilatory motions, and in a few cases breaking the quorum by refraining from voting, the democratic plan was defeated, until the several elections filled all the seats. Then a resolution to organize the committees on a republican basis was substituted for the other, and after a delay of one day, under the rules, was agreed to.

But all this time there was not a word about electing Senate officers. In fact, whenever the matter was broached the purpose was disclaimed. An impression seemed to have obtained currency that a bargain with MAHONE had been struck by which one of his democratic-repudiator adherents was to be taken care of, but no one thought it would be consummated before the assembling of the regular session in December. The precedents of the Senate all pointed to this course, and the parties to the bargain, if there was a bargain, seemed not to contemplate the rupture of precedents so ancient and honorable.

* * * * * * *

That he and his political associates asserted that executive business was the only business in order made no difference, for consistency is no longer a highly-prized jewel in politics. That an alliance of disgraceful and despicable character, which would weigh like a funeral pall upon the party, was developed, was alike a matter of indifference.

* * * * * * *

And this is the situation to-day. There are Senators on the floor who are able to appreciate the value of preserving untarnished the fair fame and good name of the republican party. There are Senators on the republican side of the Chamber whose patriotic emotions would impel them to resist any movement that retarded the course of the public service, but they seem to be paralyzed by that senseless sentimentality designated senatorial courtesy, until they are becoming particeps criminis in this great outrage.

We call upon Senator JOHN I. MITCHELL to break from this suicidal and senseless compact. He is the representative of independent and reputable republicans in Pennsylvania.

Mr. BROWN. That speaks of it as an "unholy alliance."

Mr. BURNSIDE. But not as a "corrupt bargain."

Mr. BROWN. Two or three did call it a bargain in pretty strong terms.

Mr. BURNSIDE. But they were not republican papers. No republican paper has yet called it a corrupt bargain. Those were independent papers.

Mr. BROWN. I call any paper a republican paper that always supports the nominees of the republican party.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I will have a letter scrap-book here to-morrow showing something from democratic papers down in Texas.

Mr. BROWN. Does the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] state that the Dispatch never has supported the republican candidates? I ask, for I do not know.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. Not within my knowledge; and I have had some connection with politics for about twenty-five years.

Mr. BROWN. It never supported the republican nominees?

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. Never to my knowledge.

Mr. BROWN. Does it support the democratic nominees?

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I do not think it could support anything good, either democratic or republican.

Mr. BROWN. As I have heard very different accounts from some other sources, I will put that down as a difference of opinion between the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania and others.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. You can put it down as the truth, coming from me.

Mr. BROWN. As I understand it, there is a difference of opinion, and others regard it as a good republican paper.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I do not think any one so regards it.

Mr. BROWN. I next send to the desk another extract from the Record-Union, of Sacramento.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I will mention that the Senator from California [Mr. MILLER] has already stated that that is not a republican paper. He is the tribunal which the Senator endeavored to establish for the decision of this matter.

Mr. BROWN. I will add that the Senator from California admits that it always supports the republican nominees.

Mr. BURNSIDE. No, I do not think the Senator from California admitted that.

Mr. BROWN. He will not deny it, I think.

Mr. BURNSIDE. The Senator from Georgia has made the republican Senator from the State the umpire in this matter. He said he would leave it to the republican Senator from the State. Every single paper he has quoted from here has been discredited.

Mr. HAWLEY. Except mine.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Except the paper of the Senator from Connecticut, and that does not charge a corrupt bargain; so that so far I am entirely right.

Mr. BROWN. I do not think I am making any mistake about it when I read from papers that are admitted to have supported generally the nominees of the republican party.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Does the Senator in this case refuse the determination of the umpire and jump the track?

Mr. BROWN. No, sir.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Let your umpire decide; you objected to my decision. For one day let the Senator stick to his word, and not fly the track.

Mr. BROWN. I am going to try to keep cool, very cool in this matter, for I do not want to do anything wrong in it.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I shall not say that I am cool; if I did, I should bring the house down. [Laughter.]

Mr. BROWN. As one of the Senators from California, the democratic Senator, says that this paper always supports the republican nominees, and as the republican Senator from California does not deny that as I understand, and expressly admits that it did support General Garfield for the Presidency, I think I have a right to put the extract on the record and let it go to the country, and let the country decide whether it is a republican paper or not.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I am willing to leave it just as it is. The Senator has appealed from his own tribunal, his own umpire; so I have nothing further to say about it.

Mr. BROWN. I simply had stated that if a republican Senator from the State would say that a paper in his State from which I quoted was not a republican paper, I would not insist on putting it in as an extract from a republican paper, and I shall not unless there is other proof which satisfies the country beyond question that the Senator is mistaken. I will simply leave this question to the Senators and the editors at home to settle between themselves.

Mr. BURNSIDE. When the Senator first began he did not make any conditions. He had undertaken to show that republican papers in the country had charged a corrupt bargain on the republican Senators, and he said he would leave it to the Senators from the State to decide if a paper was a republican paper, and he would not have the article read if the Senators from the State said it was not a republican paper. However, I am very glad to have the extracts read.

Mr. BROWN. I respectfully submit to the honorable Senator from Rhode Island that he is getting very technical about the matter. Even if the Senators from the State were to happen to make a mistake about it, that ought not to exclude from the Senate and the American people evidence as to whether it is a mistake on a Senator's part and whether the paper is a republican paper. If all the evidence does not show that it is a republican paper, then the country will give no credit to it as such. If the evidence shows that it is a republican paper, the country will say that it is republican, notwithstanding the Senators from the State may think differently.

Mr. BURNSIDE. The whole subject-matter at issue is so small that you have to be technical to get at it. It is not big enough to treat in a general way, and you have to be very technical in order to get anything out of it at all.

Mr. BROWN. I am a little astonished that so small a matter should appear even to ruffle the feeling or the temper of the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. BURNSIDE. The Senator made the issue with me the other day, and claimed that he could show from the republican press of the country that they charged a corrupt bargain upon this side. Unless the Senator supports his claim with something stronger, it will be seen that I was exactly right in the position I took.

Mr. BROWN. I desire to have the extracts read, and if I do not show, as I may not have the particular paper which says there was a corrupt bargain, I think I can get it.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I did not say a single paper could not be produced, and even if twenty should be produced here out of 3,000 republican papers in the country, what impression would that make upon the mind of any reasonable, fair man in politics or business? Could you take the absolute assertion of twenty republican papers that we have made a corrupt bargain and hold that up to the Senate and the country as a representation of the opinion of the republican press of the country of 3,000 newspapers? It is too small a thing to take into consideration at all, and I would not think of it for a second if the Senator had not tried to make some kind of issue; and I thought I would be civil enough to meet him.

Mr. BROWN. The Senator from Rhode Island does not know anything about others that I have got behind; I may have twenty-five or a hundred out of 3,000.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I do not care if you have a hundred out of 3,000, I can bring a scrap-book here to-morrow with articles from Texas papers commenting on all you gentlemen, and from the Vicksburgh Herald, and I can show what they say.

Mr. BROWN. I would not ruffle the temper of my friend, for whom I have great respect——

Mr. BURNSIDE. I say again that I do not declare I am cool because that would bring the house down, but my habit of speaking leads people to think I am mad when I am not. I am not the least bit angry.

Mr. BROWN. I know the Senate understands it; it is only a way my friend has; he is never excited; and I would not excite him for any consideration. As I have said, I have a great many more papers from which I shall read. Indeed as it seems this is not exactly a thing that is most pleasant to the Senator from Rhode Island, I do not know but that I may stop before I get near through; I may lay some aside for another installment; I may want to take up the matter when he is better rested. I have a considerable installment behind.

Mr. BURNSIDE. The Senator has read from about six papers, and now will he allow me to have an extract read from the Louisville Courier-Journal?

Mr. BROWN. Not until I am through. Then I will give you days, if you desire.

Mr. BURNSIDE. This is the only extract I ask to have read at this time.

Mr. BROWN. No, sir, I will not let you interpolate it now, but you can take a whole day and read as many as have been read on our side. I prefer not to do it now, but I want to go on with the evidence from republican sources. I ask to have another article read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

But there are too many indications that the dominant party of the present time is rapidly yielding to the degrading influences which assail all long-established factions, and the present situation in the United States Senate is a significant reminder of the progress that is being made toward degeneracy. The Mahone bargain, notwithstanding all attempts to cover it up, stands out in ghastly deformity as one of those discreditable and unprincipled compacts for the making of which most people, until recently, believed the democrats alone competent. The whole plane of the transaction is so low that it demonstrates a very much greater demoralization than appears on the surface. In adopting MAHONE, the republican Senators have distinctly condoned the doctrine of financial repudiation. It is nonsense to pretend that because MAHONE's faction call themselves "readjusters," therefore they are not repudiators. The debt of Virginia was not a carpet-bag debt, but in all senses an honest debt. It amounted to nearly thirty-three million dollars. Riddleberger, the republican caucus nominee for Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate, carried a bill through the Virginia Legislature which scaled the debt down to $19,500,000. That bill repudiated one-third of the debt, and without any rational pretext. It further refused to recognize accrued interest. It reduced the current interest 50 per cent., and it reserved the right to tax the bonds in such a manner that all interest would be cut off. It was upon this platform that MAHONE was elected to the Senate. This is his financial creed. It is an infamous creed, and those who have adopted him and pledged the Federal patronage to his faction have beyond all serious question committed themselves to the atrocious financial programme which he represents.

When a party can do such a thing as this, and above all when it can do such a thing as this without provoking instant and general condemnation of its rank and file, it is in a very serious condition. When further we reflect that this shameless abandonment of principle, this hob-nobbing with thievery, has been agreed upon for no higher purpose than the maintenance of partisan control of the Senate, we cannot fail to realize that the signs of decadence above referred to are here most conspicuously apparent. When a party has reached the length of caring infinitely more for the spoils than for anything else that can be named, it cannot be doubted that it is approaching the end of its usefulness, to say the least.

Mr. BURNSIDE. From what paper is that?

Mr. BROWN. It is from a California paper, the Record-Union of Sacramento.

Mr. BURNSIDE. The one that the Senator from California [Mr. MILLER] said was not a republican paper.

Mr. BROWN. The one that I have proved was a republican paper.

Mr. BURNSIDE. The Senator has not proved it; I take issue with him there distinctly.

Mr. BROWN. I leave it to the country to judge.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Your own umpire says it is not a republican paper.

Mr. BROWN. My umpire will not say that; he admits that it supports the republican ticket generally, and supported the last republican candidate for President; therefore he will not say it.

Mr. BURNSIDE. It is of little consequence, but I insist on the umpire being protected; I do not want him to be thrown overboard in this way.

Mr. BROWN. The article speaks of it as a ghastly deformity and a discreditable and unprincipled compact. That is pretty strong language.

Mr. BURNSIDE. But it is not from a republican paper.

Mr. BROWN. I leave the country to judge; but I insist that it is.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I do not think the country will care a snap for it. It will not think any more about it. If the Senator believes he is making an issue here that the country will think anything about, he is very much mistaken.

Mr. BROWN. I do not suppose the country will be disturbed by it, for I see the Senator from Rhode Island is not. I do not want to disturb anybody. I am simply reading these extracts because it seems they maintain the position I took the other day in reference to the attitude of some of the republican press. As I think very well of that paper, I will send up one more extract from it and have it read. The date is the 15th of this month. It was said the other day, if I recollect, that the republican papers are rather coming into the idea. This is very late; it only came here to-day from California.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Now Senator MAHONE is, unfortunately for himself, in very much the same kind of position as Nell Gwynne. The popular belief in his political virtue may be said to have ceased to exist. Few people, perhaps, believe that he sold his vote in a direct and open way, as venal voters sell the franchise at election. But there certainly is a widespread conviction that he made a bargain with the republicans whereby he was to secure the Secretary and Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate, and whereby, also, his readjusting friends in Virginia were to obtain the support derivable from Federal patronage. And if Mr. MAHONE holds himself ready to do battle with all who think thus of him, he will find that he has undertaken a contract which is several sizes too large for him to execute. The plain truth is that nobody doubts his venality, and that there never has been any serious denial of it attempted.

The republicans are by their present conduct only bringing these facts closer home to the people. They are holding up MAHONE, and talking about him, and causing him to be talked of, so much, that presently everybody will understand the whole situation perfectly, and what is still more serious, everybody will remember it. The democrats, in baiting MAHONE, are acting with quite unaccustomed sagacity. They have nothing to lose and very much to gain by this dead-lock. They know that their best policy is simply to uncover the whole of the discreditable bargain, and to cause it to be exposed to the country, and, as it were, fixed in the pillory for all to gaze their fill at. They are aware also that the republican masses are not at all satisfied with the choice of George Gorham for Secretary of the Senate; that he is regarded as a thoroughly untrustworthy, disloyal, disreputable adventurer; and that because of the putting forward of so objectionable a person, the republican members of the Senate will obtain no support from the party. In fact this is a machine quarrel, and one of the dirtiest of the kind, and no intelligent republican desires the success of the republican Senators in it. The man Gorham ought to be dropped, and the man Riddleberger, and the man MAHONE. The republican party can hold relations with neither of them save at the sacrifice of its own reputation.

Mr. BROWN. I have just had handed to me the American Newspaper Directory. In that I see the papers of the United States are classified, and the papers that I am reading from are put down here as republican. The directory may be wrong. I must leave that to the public and those who get up the directory to decide. I suppose each paper in giving its name has itself classified politically as it really intends to be classified; and as they have the names of their papers in the advertisements put into the directory as republican, and still insist that they are such——

Mr. BURNSIDE. Are all the papers the Senator named classified as republican?

Mr. BROWN. I desire to call the attention of the honorable Senator from Rhode Island to the directory especially, and I state that they are all classified as republican.

Mr. BURNSIDE. All the papers named are?

Mr. BROWN. The three you have so much contested.

Mr. BURNSIDE. How is the Boston Herald put down?

Mr. BROWN. I have not looked at that. To accommodate my friend I will have that looked to and inform him. If it is not republican I certainly do not wish to quote it as such.

Mr. President, I have some other extracts here and some others down at my room, but as I do not desire to make my friend from Rhode Island nervous—and I am afraid he will get a little so—I think I shall suspend this reading for the present, and probably bring in the other installment after he has introduced his that he speaks of. I merely want, as a lawyer has to do, to have some evidence in rebuttal after I have heard his evidence, and I shall therefore reserve the balance for the present.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Now, Mr. President, I shall detain the Senate but a moment, and merely to reiterate what I stated the other day in the Senate, that the republican press as a body have made no such charges; and until better evidence comes, I deny that these are republican papers. I send to the Clerk's desk a little article from a sound democratic paper—everybody will acknowledge that—and I think that touches the case about as closely as anything can. I ask to have that read.

Mr. BROWN. What paper is that from?

Mr. BURNSIDE. The Louisville Courier-Journal.

Mr. BROWN. That is democratic.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I think there is more good sound sense in one line of that than in a volume of such stuff as the Senator from Georgia has had read.

Mr. BROWN. I have no doubt that it will suit the Senator's purpose better.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

HITTING THE NAIL ON THE HEAD.

[From the Louisville Courier-Journal, democratic.]

As the debate in the Senate proceeds the democrats are put more and more in a false position. The refusal to permit the constitutional majority to complete the work of organization rests upon nothing more substantial than personal good-will for a few officials who may be embarrassed by the change. The country does not sympathize with this amiable sentiment. The longing of Senators after vainglorious personal display should be subordinated to great public uses. It is a truly regretful circumstance that this is not the experience of the hour, and consequently we greatly apprehend that we shall lose the advantages which belong to the situation and which would otherwise accrue to us.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I said the other day that I did not think the Senator could produce any republican papers that called this a corrupt bargain. I should not have been surprised if he had produced half a dozen or ten, but he has not. I should not have been at all surprised if he could have produced a dozen or twenty that said this was a corrupt bargain out of all the 3,000 republican newspapers in the United States; but he has not produced one that calls it a corrupt bargain. He has produced articles from independent papers that squint that way, that says it looks like a corrupt bargain, and democrats have a right to think it is a corrupt bargain, and all that. That is not a very bold way of talking, and it is indulged in a little too much in all parts of the country. We should all be better off if we did less of it. Now, I maintain that I was quite right in what I stated the other day that the Senator cannot show that the republican press of this country thinks in the least degree that we have been guilty of a corrupt bargain.

Mr. BROWN and Mr. HAWLEY addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. HAWLEY. If the Senator from Georgia has any more to read, I will wait.

Mr. BROWN. Not now. I stated what the papers were from which I read.

Mr. HAWLEY. I thought perhaps the Senator might continue this exercise until warm weather. [Laughter.] It seems to be quite as interesting as anything we can ourselves invent on the spot. I had not seen the distinguished Senator from Georgia till we met at this session, since as president of the Chicago convention in 1868 I had the great pleasure of welcoming him to the platform in response to an enthusiastic call from the whole audience; and this is the manner in which he was brought to our attention, though his presence was well known; the news came before him! Said a distinguished delegate from the State of Louisiana while we were waiting for the committee on resolutions:

But we have another marked event, of special moment—that there is with us to-day, in full heart and in full fellowship, one of the former governors in the days of the rebellion, of one of the rebellious States, who has since become reconstructed, [applause,] has proved himself, in the fire, as true as steel, a genuine convert, and in fellowship with the republican party.

I move, sir, that during the interim, until we have the report of the committee on credentials, ex-Governor Joseph E. Brown, of Georgia, be invited to address the convention. [Applause. Cries of "Brown!" "Brown!"]

[Laughter.]

Whereupon your humble servant said:

It is hardly necessary to put a motion which has such a reception. Will Governor Brown address the convention?

He made a few introductory remarks with his customary modesty and said:

I do not wish, sir, to intrude upon the proceedings of this convention. I came here, as has been well remarked, a reconstructed rebel. [Laughter and applause.] I was an original secessionist. [Laughter. Cries of "That's frank!" "An open confession is good for the soul!" "Platform!" amid which Mr. Brown advanced to the stage.]

I omit the larger part of it, though I will lend him the book. He proceeded in the course of time to say:

Hence I have advocated every measure, from that time until this, for reconstruction. [Applause.]

Every one of the reconstruction measures. They had been going about three years then, beginning in 1866 and continuing in 1867, and this was in 1868:

When the President of the United States proposed his plan I advised our people to accept it, because we had fallen, and we had no other power to negotiate with but him.

Again:

As I understood the doctrines of the democratic party, they were State sovereignty and the right of secession. The sword has established a different doctrine, and hence it is that I am no longer bound by party allegiance to stand by the democratic party. Where do I naturally fall, then? The Hamiltonian and Websterian construction of the Constitution has been established by the sword. I have acquiesced in that, and as I find the republican party on that platform to-day my oath has bound me to abandon the doctrine which the democratic party stood upon, and that naturally leads me, as I think, into the republican party.

And again:

Our democratic friends have appealed to the whole country against negro suffrage, have showered anathemas upon it—

And this was before we had the fifteenth amendment—and denounced it as an outrage upon humanity and upon society; and yet, in the late elections there the negro who would vote the democratic ticket was really a very respectable fellow, [laughter,] while a white man who voted the republican ticket was a scalawag and a traitor.

There has been a little change in Georgia since then. And again—and this is the interesting part, because I was reminded of it by his remarks concerning bargains—

Just in conclusion let me say, while we have a hard fight to make in Georgia, if you will give us the fruits of the victory we have lately won in a desperate fight we will carry Georgia for General Grant.

Conditions precedent, a bargain, though; if they could have the patronage they would promise to carry the State! Then speaking of the bill for the complete admission of Georgia to its rights he said:

And the amendment we desire is this: That the Senate of the United States amend that bill so as to allow the governor-elect, Governor Bullock, to convene his Legislature on ten days' notice; let him be inaugurated, let them act; and they will adopt the constitutional amendment; and then let them elect Senators and receive us into Congress, and give us control of the State government and its patronage, which we fought for and won, and which we must have if we are to succeed in this contest. [Great applause.]

[Laughter.]

Well, Mr. President, he got it. No man could have resisted that pathetic entreaty; it was not in the heart of the Administration or of Governor Bullock. His friend, Governor Bullock, made him chief-justice of Georgia. In due time he quit it. I do not know the details of all that history, but he is a very persuasive man. It was only in this late campaign that he besought of the colored men of Georgia to sustain him against the Bourbonism of that State, and remarked, upon winning the victory, that it was the death-knell of Bourbonism in Georgia, and the night before there was to be a Senator chosen he made that very candid and fair and creditable speech concerning the rights and the votes of the colored men, from which an extract has been read by himself here, and he got the eighteen, I believe it was, republican votes in the Legislature the next day when the election took place; and we had every right to expect him to take a seat upon this side of the House. I am astonished that he should have been thus false to the great body of enthusiastic black and white men who sustained him there and gave him every republican vote in the Legislature. I affirm that on his record we had a better right to expect him here than the gallant soldier from Virginia. With that persuasiveness which has ever accompanied him he swung from side to side in the great combat; he took the great prize from the democratic party, to which he had lately returned, and now comes here to lecture us about a bargain. [Laughter.]

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, the honorable Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] has rehearsed nothing new here. I have already, two or three times, referred to the fact in this Senate that there was a period when I acted with the republican party. I have never on any occasion deceived anybody.

Mr. HAWLEY. Never?

Mr. BROWN. Never, never; and there was no utterance that I made in the late campaign that could deceive anybody on this question. At the time I met the honorable Senator in Chicago, I was acting with the republican party, because they stood upon the reconstruction measures and the democratic party did not stand there. I told them, with him in the chair there before me, with all the gravity he could put on upon such an occasion, that I was an original secessionist. I did not pretend that I was a Union man; but I did say in the same speech, I think, what he has not read—though I have not looked at it in ten or twelve years—that I had sense enough to know when I was whipped. I fought you as long as there was any chance to fight for our principles; but when we were conquered I surrendered, and I saw that slavery was gone and the right of secession was gone. There was a large majority of the white people of the South who did not think that the reconstruction measures that had then been put upon us by Congress would ever go into effect. The democracy of Georgia and of the South believed that the democrats would come into power and that under democratic auspices and administration the reconstruction measures would not be carried out. I was satisfied they would be, and that the best thing we could do was to accept them, and accept them at once, and so advised my people. In other words, I took the position exactly as I stated there, that the doctrines of Jefferson and Calhoun on that subject could no longer be maintained; that the sword had decided against the right of secession, and we had to fall back upon the State-rights theories of Webster and Clay.

I will further remark that up to the end of the war I had never on any occasion failed to vote and act with the democratic party. We had already seen enough then to be sure that the democratic party when it met in convention would not plant itself upon the reconstruction measures. I had advised my people about the time the reconstruction acts were passed to accept them at once; I had said "agree with thine adversary quickly," our conquerors have the power to dictate the terms, and we have nothing to do but submit to them. If we could not sustain our cause when we had 500,000 bayonets in our hands it was folly to talk about sustaining it after our armies had surrendered and the Government stood over us with 1,200,000 armed men whom it had on the muster-rolls when we surrendered. There was no other alternative but acquiescence, and I considered it the height of folly to make any resistance. Therefore my opinion was that the best thing we could do was to accept at once the terms dictated by the conqueror; and as the republican party had the control of the Government it represented the conqueror. I thought it best to act with you for the time in the hope that these troubles might end there.

The democracy took a different course. They soon after met in convention, and they laid down a platform that the reconstruction measures were unconstitutional, null, and void, and they nominated a candidate for Vice-President who had written a letter and published it, in which he stated in substance that it was the duty of the President of the United States to declare them so and refuse to execute them. The democracy at that time had not learned that the war had wrought a great change and that we had lost the Jeffersonian theory and the theory of the Virginia and Kentucky resolutions. They believed that the people of the United States revolting at these reconstruction measures would sweep them from the statute-book by putting the democratic party in power. I did not think so. There we separated, and separating at a time when there was so much feeling, so much vindictiveness as naturally grew up after the war and under such a separation, it was very certain that without the patronage of the Government we could not carry the elections in Georgia and I very frankly stated so. We were not at that time, however, acting under the obligation of United States Senators.

It was the ordinary case of a party convention, the convention of the republican party, which, whatever it professes, acts upon the principle that to the victors belong the spoils. It was a suggestion that the party convention give its due share of the spoils to its party friends in our section. Negotiations for a division of the offices among the members of a party convention is one thing; a contract, if one should be made, between United States Senators to give a particular Senator certain offices for his friends in consideration that he would vote to give other Senators the chairmanships of certain committees, would be another and a very different thing. There is therefore no analogy between what occurred at the Chicago convention and what some of the republican newspapers charge has occurred in this Senate.

I was not negotiating then with a constitutional body that has legislative powers, or a body that has solemn official duties to perform. If it was a negotiation at all, it was a negotiation with a mere party convention. Therefore, as already stated, there was no similarity between the cases. If there has been any improper negotiation here—and about that I have nothing now to say—it has been between the Senator from Virginia and other Senators. A very different case from a speaker from a particular State in a political convention saying "you must give us certain patronage or we cannot succeed." But you did not give to the republicans of Georgia their share of the patronage. You did not have the offices to spare; you wanted Federal patronage at home, and very little of it came to Georgia; only what was there in the State. If it was a compact of a political character simply between an individual and a political convention, it was not carried out on your part, though I admit the fact that the Senator states that I was afterward appointed chief-justice of the State and accepted the position and for the time I retired from politics. I was appointed by a republican administration in Georgia and I see no impropriety in my having accepted the position from that administration when I was acting openly with that party.

On the subject of patronage allow me to say that since I have ceased to act with your party in 1872, you have done very gross injustice to your own friends in Georgia and the South generally. There is no use in talking about any trade in regard to that sort of patronage. It is distributed by politicians not acting under official obligations for political effect; but you have needed it at home I suppose, as I have said. And I read here the other day from the Official Register to show that you did not give in the Departments in Washington to Georgia one-half the number of appointments that she is entitled to. And yet you complain all the time that you cannot carry elections there and that republicanism cannot prosper there. Now, just change this rule over to Connecticut and Rhode Island——

Mr. HAWLEY. Will the gentleman come back again if we will give him all the patronage?

Mr. BROWN. No, sir, not for all you could possibly give me. You could not get me to go back under any circumstances until you mend some of your ways.

But I say in Connecticut and Rhode Island and other States you take the patronage, and if you did not get it you would not carry your elections there; it is very hard work occasionally for you to carry them even with all the patronage thrown there.

But there was a time when I came back to the democracy, or they came to me—it does not matter which—in other words, after having made an honest effort to get rid of the reconstruction measures in 1868, which I predicted before they went into it would prove a failure, the democratic party found that these measures were fixed facts, the constitutional amendments had been adopted, they were part of the Constitution of the United States, and the Supreme Court held the reconstruction acts constitutional; and my honorable colleague on my left, [Mr. HILL,] who had taken strong ground and was the ablest leader of the democracy in 1868, seeing in 1870 that these measures were fixed upon the country, was among the very first to come out and acquiesce in them and advise acquiescence, and he has stood there from that day to this.

The democratic party then met in 1872 and nominated Horace Greeley for President, and they adopted the reconstruction measures as fully as the republican party had done. I went with you in 1868 because the democratic party refused to adopt them when I thought it was best for our people that they should, and because there was in that day of excitement violent discussion and violence of various sorts, and I thought it would lead to another revolution if we undertook to resist them. I therefore thought it better for all sections of the country that we should adopt them at once, and I stood on them. But after the democracy had made the effort to get rid of them and had met in convention and solemnly adopted them, there was then no further reason why they and I should not act together, especially after the legislation and practices of the Government under General Grant's administration up to that period, much of which I did not approve.

When the democrats came to that platform in 1872, and from that day to this, I have continued to act with them. Therefore I was always a democrat on all occasions when they were acting upon the platform they stood upon prior to the war. I saw after the war that that platform could not be maintained, and as I stated here a few days ago I am always on one side or the other, and when I could no longer act with them I acted with you upon the reconstruction measures. When they came back and planted themselves upon them, I believed it was better for the country to stand with them, and I then took my position with them again and I have acted there ever since.

After I left the supreme bench of Georgia, where I resigned my position, I took no active part in politics so far as running for any office was concerned; but I was independent and outspoken as a democrat, made speeches, and wrote letters and published them when I pleased, as I always expect to do. And there was no question about my position.

But there came a period when I was appointed to fill a vacancy in the Senate, very unexpectedly called from my private business. There was, as stated a few days ago by a Senator here, an assault made upon the governor for appointing me to the place on the ground that I had once been a republican and acted with you in favor of the reconstruction measures. That assault was made upon me by the Bourbon democracy. I have heard frequently the use of the term "Bourbon" here. I am not a Bourbon democrat; I am a national democrat. I stood upon the platform of the national democracy during the campaign for governor and Legislature in Georgia last fall. I proclaimed it everywhere, I deceived nobody, I stand there to-day. I made the issue with the little wing that still exists there of Bourbon democrats. I will tell you just what I mean by Bourbon democrats.

The democracy were not Bourbon necessarily in 1868, though I thought the tendency was that way when they tried to maintain the old doctrines that had existed prior to the war by an appeal to the people; but after having made that appeal and the people having decided against them and the reconstruction measure having been ratified and become fixed as part of the supreme law, then I think it was Bourbonism for a man to refuse to recognize that fixed fact and continue to say that the reconstruction measures were unconstitutional, null, and void. The person who led, not as a candidate, but was really the head of the opposition to me, was a very distinguished and able gentleman who once sat upon this floor, Hon. Robert Toombs. He made a speech in Atlanta against me about three nights before my election, in which he took the position that the democracy in 1868 were right when they declared the reconstruction acts unconstitutional, null, and void; and he then declared them still unconstitutional, null, and void. He is the leader of a little wing of democrats there and fought me. I say a man who has learned no more than that, who still stands for the old platform adopted prior to the war, and who has not learned that the constitutional amendments are obligatory upon the country, and who now proclaims the reconstruction measures to be still unconstitutional, null, and void, I class as a Bourbon. There is a very small class of those democrats in Georgia. They are very respectable, however, in point of ability. I made the issue with this class squarely and stood where I have stood on this issue ever since the passage of the reconstruction measures. I stood for a free ballot and a fair count, and I still stand there. I have deceived nobody.

And here I want to notice a remark made to-day by my honorable and esteemed friend the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] that I have not quite met the expectations on that side of the Chamber in the course I have taken with the democracy, as I understood the substance of his remark to be. I promised nothing else; and the republicans of Georgia and their leaders will say so. A day or two ago I saw in a New York paper an article as full of errors as one could be in reference to my course there, stating that I had said in my speech the night before the election, and had omitted it in the publication, that if I were elected I would not go into the democratic caucus. There were over two thousand people who heard that speech, quite a respectable audience. All the senators and representatives in the Legislature were present. I said no such thing. Let us look a minute at the improbability of it, if it needs any discussion. There are two hundred and nineteen senators and representatives in our General Assembly, two hundred and nine of them democrats and ten of them republicans. If in courting the republican vote there I had said in a public speech, "If you republicans will elect me I will not go into the democratic caucus," nothing could more certainly have sealed my defeat next day with two hundred and nine democrats there as part of my audience hearing it. If I had been going on mere political policy, I or any other man would have had more sense than to make such an appeal.

Mr. HAWLEY. Will the gentleman kindly state what was the division between the Norwood and the Colquitt democrats; what was the respective strength of those two parties in the Legislature?

Mr. BROWN. Governor Colquitt carried the election by about fifty-five thousand majority; I do not remember exactly the figures.

Mr. HAWLEY. I speak of the members of the Legislature. How were they divided? Was there not a division in that respect?

Mr. BROWN. I do not remember without looking back at the list; and I do not know in every case whether a particular member was a Colquitt democrat or a Norwood democrat. I did know who was a Brown democrat and an anti-Brown democrat. I also know this, that in many counties where there were Brown democrats run for the Legislature they carried a much larger majority than Governor Colquitt carried. I will take my own county, Fulton, where Atlanta is located; Governor Colquitt carried that by 230 majority; there was a regular Brown democratic legislative ticket and an anti-Brown ticket, which was a sort of fusion ticket, run. There were three members of the house elected from that county. The man who received the lowest vote on the Brown ticket was elected by over a thousand majority over the highest on the anti-Brown ticket. In the county of Cobb, adjoining us, Governor Colquitt carried it by about three hundred and ten majority, as I recollect; the Brown ticket carried it by about eight hundred majority.

Mr. HAWLEY. The republicans supporting it.

Mr. BROWN. Some did and some did not; I think I got the larger part of them. I know I tried to, as I suppose the Senator would have done under similar circumstances. Take the county of Bartow next to that, and ex-Senator Norwood carried that county by over six hundred majority, and yet the candidates for the Legislature who ran on the Brown ticket were elected. So that I did not exactly run on either of them; my name was run more with Colquitt, it is true, but a great many of Norwood's friends were among my warmest supporters. And I will say in reference to the republicans, as that is mentioned, that I have always had their confidence, and I flatter myself I have it to-day. There may be a few here, and I tell you they are very few, who are desiring positions who may think it would be popular with the Administration to tell you I have not that confidence, but if you go with me to Georgia I will show you that those whose opinions are worth most there, as well as the mass of the republican party, are still my friends and I have their confidence. I have not deceived them. I did all I could to get their votes for my friends to the Legislature, and I believe that was the course any honorable man would take under the circumstances, and I believe that a large majority of them sustained me in the elections.

Of the ten republican representatives every one voted for me. I did not need their votes to secure my election, because I had nearly two-thirds of the democrats in each house, but I was just as thankful for the votes of my republican friends as I was for the votes of the democrats, who were my friends. I said to the republicans that I was a national democrat, that I should act with the democratic party; at the same time that I would do all I could in Washington, if I came here, to see that justice was done to them as well as the democrats, and I intend to carry that out. While I act with the democrats and am a democrat, I intend to continue to insist that the republican Administration do justice, which it has not done, to the republicans of Georgia. You have never done justice to the colored people there; you have never done justice to the republican leaders there who are white. I have already given the reasons by referring to the Official

Register. You have never distributed patronage to them as you have in your own States in political campaigns. And while I would be glad, as I stated the other day, to get a portion of the patronage for the democrats, still, as you are determined that "to the victors shall belong the spoils," and that a minority of the people of the United States known as the republican party shall have all the spoils, I am not going to make an issue on that. You will go on upon that platform, and I will continue to demand for the republicans of Georgia, as I and my colleague alone represent them upon this floor, their proper share. And if you give to the Senator from Virginia the executive patronage of Virginia because he goes for "a free ballot and a fair count," then I demand that for the democracy of Georgia as well as the republicans. There is no division in Georgia on that subject. You can bring no case in the late elections there for years past where there has been any violence or any fraud in our elections. There may have been somebody with a broken nose on account of some personal difficulty in our late election.

Mr. McMILLAN. May I ask the Senator from Georgia whether at the last election there was not a disturbance in Georgia at Forsyth, where the supervisors of election were interfered with?

Mr. BROWN. No, sir; none that ever I heard of.

Mr. McMILLAN. I have heard such a statement made as to the last election.

Mr. BROWN. I never heard of it, and my colleague says he never heard of it. I think it is probably a little like the story of the factory that was burned in Mississippi.

Mr. McMILLAN. I received the statement from a Georgian.

Mr. BROWN. There was no disturbance there that any honorable republican will complain of; I never heard of it.

Mr. McMILLAN. Is there a polling place there at Forsyth?

Mr. BROWN. Yes, sir; there is.

Mr. McMILLAN. That was the place indicated.

Mr. BROWN. Forsyth is the county-seat of the county of Monroe.

Mr. McMILLAN. Forty or fifty miles from Atlanta, is it not?

Mr. BROWN. Yes, sir, about eighty; and there was a large poll there, but I never heard of the slightest trouble there that kept anybody from the polls. There may have been a fight, some men may have fallen out as they did in your State and had a fisticuff.

Mr. McMILLAN. Was the vote of that place returned and counted?

Mr. BROWN. It was honorably returned and honorably counted. No, I defy you to point to any wrong in the election there. It was held as freely as it was in any of your States and you cannot produce the evidence to the contrary.

I say then that the democrats stand to-day for "a free ballot and a fair count;" they stand for internal improvements by the General Government, improvements of rivers and harbors. They stand as I do for free education, for taxing ourselves all we are able to bear to educate our children, and for calling upon the Federal Government to help educate the colored people. They stand for whatever can be done to develop the agricultural resources of the whole country. They stand for all that can be done to develop the mineral resources of the country and under a just and fair system they stand for maintaining, as far as it can be done consistently with the rights of other classes, the manufacturing interests of the country. They stand for a sound currency. They stand for a progressive move forward.

I took the position that the world moves and we must move with it. I stand there to-day, and the democracy of Georgia stand there; and if I had taken my seat on the other side of the Chamber, as in the case referred to the other day by the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. HAWLEY,] I suppose I should have been considered all right. But as I pledged myself before I came here to the people everywhere, republicans and democrats, to act with the national democracy, I will not deceive them, and I have not. And I say you cannot truly charge us with anything but fair play in the elections. You cannot charge that there was any unfairness in the count. As I have already stated, we have a much freer ballot there than they have in some of the New England States whose constitutions and laws I have discussed upon this floor, and a freer election than they have in Connecticut. I have misled nobody. I have proclaimed myself a democrat all the while since 1872, and I ran on that platform; I have stood there from that day to this. I told the republicans in Georgia that I was a democrat and should act with the democratic party, but I would try to do justice to them, and I intend to do it as their representative here, they having no republican representative; and I shall continue to press their rights upon your consideration. I intend to do them the same justice that I do the democrats. That is all the pledge I have made to them, and I am going to try to redeem it in the strictest good faith. That has been substantially my political history. I have not denied at any time that I went to the republican convention at Chicago in 1868 and that I supported your nominees with all my power. I do not expect to deny it, and if the democrats stood to-day upon the Seymour and Blair platform of 1868 I should be standing with you, notwithstanding your errors and malpractices. But when the democrats came back to the reconstruction platform that I stood upon, I preferred then to act with them. I did it openly and squarely and fairly, and have had no concealment about it.

This is substantially my record, Mr. President. I have stated what I understand to be a national democrat and what I understand to be a Bourbon democrat. Standing upon the democratic platform and fighting that gallant little Bourbon wing, which has a great deal of brain power and a very small number of followers, I succeeded upon that platform. I was sustained by more than two to one of the people of Georgia, judging from the vote given me by their representatives, and I think I may say by more than that proportion of the people who voted for those representatives. Ten out of the number were republicans and the rest were democrats. I have carried out every pledge I made to them. I have come here and acted as I told them I should do, and I shall continue to act so, and I am very sorry if anybody's expectations have not been realized. It may have been that on account of the platform that I laid down for myself, because it is substantially the democratic platform of the Union, which I said I would stand by in a speech the night before the election, you were led to think at the North that that could scarcely be democratic doctrine down there, and you thought it was an advance step and being so I ought to come here and act with your party. If that is your meaning, then I can simply say you have misunderstood Georgia and the South. We have all advanced forward to the position I have already mentioned there, and if you have not learned it you will learn it. You will find no more Bourbonism there in power. I do not remember making the remark that that election sealed the fate of Bourbonism there, but I might have made it very truly. It is very certain that Bourbonism as I have described it has not power there, and cannot have again. We intend to go forward with the age, we intend to go forward on the platform I have already mentioned, we intend to go forward for the great material prosperity of this country. We intend to unite with you in building up this country. We intend to do all we can in the South to aid in making it a great country. We have the soil and the climate and the mineral wealth, and everything that is necessary to invite capital. We invite you all, and we will treat you well any time you come there. You are bringing capital to us. We are glad to see it; we intend to protect it, and as I stated the other day in the remarks I made you make a mistake when you think that either southern capitalists or northern capitalists will encourage you in a movement to re-reconstruct the South or to put the ignorant people there, white or colored, over the intelligence and the virtue and the property of the State. You do not do it in your own States and you cannot do it there. Intelligence and wisdom and experience and intellect will always by one means and another control in every society; it will do it with us as it does it with you. While we do that, we shall act on a line that will do full justice to everybody; we shall coerce nobody from the ballot-box or to the ballot-box; we shall drive nobody from it by educational restrictions or like restrictions, but we will in good faith take care of the weaker class and act honorably and honestly by them. Where they unite with our party we will give them what you have not given them, a fair showing for the offices; we will do all we can by policy and by fair means to carry our elections, and we expect generally to do it.

Now, one word about "the solid South" that has been referred to, and I have done. I have spoken a little longer than I expected. "The solid South" was referred to to-day as a standing menace. The solid Northern States are not regarded as a menace. There are sixteen Southern States that, on account of the course you have taken as the republican party, believe their safety is with the democratic party. They happen to be together in one section; they can be counted on in advance for the democrats because they know the democratic platform and the democratic doctrines, and they vote for them as an old whig State used to vote for the whigs and a democratic State for the democrats. They have 138 votes. Then I mentioned the names of fourteen States the other day that have 149 votes in the electoral college that are just as solid for the republican party as the South is for the democratic party.

Mr. HAWLEY. Oh, no!

Mr. BROWN. Just as solid; it is as impossible for us to carry them; and the fight in each case is for the doubtful States. If we carry the doubtful States we carry the election, as we expect to do the next presidential canvass. If you carry them contrary to our expectations you will carry the election. Therefore there are fourteen solid Northern republican States to sixteen solid Southern democratic States, and the rest of the States are doubtful. In each contest it is your interest to say to the North that the South is solid for the democrats. Well, we can say with equal truth fourteen Northern States are solid for the republicans. The fight, then, is for the doubtful States.

Now, whenever you cease to do us injustice, and permit the Southern States to manage their own affairs in their own way as you claim the right to do and as you do, "the solid South" may soon be broken; but as long as you proclaim it in the Senate that the purpose of the majority here is to act in such a way as to control the elections in States, you drive the South solid for the democratic party. I had much rather have a division, not on the color line as it has been, but to see it cut across the other way, a part of the colored people and a part of the white people acting on each side; and if you would act toward us in such a manner that we believed you looked to our prosperity—I do not mean your northern people, but northern politicians—you can soon split us in spite of all we can do; but as long as you pursue the course now pursued you drive us to a solid South, whether you succeed or not.

But I say this in behalf of your own people: I do not believe the people who are the constituents of those of you who are most ultra in this fight will sustain you in it. I may be wrong. I believe the people of the North and the West desire to bury these difficulties out of sight, and that the whole country be restored again to peace and harmony, that we come together now that slavery is out of the way, and no reason why we should not, and destroy all these distinctions of North and South and East and West, and that we move forward in one grand and glorious career for the general prosperity and building up of this country. That is what we want in the South. We are ready to strike hands with you on that at any time, and as soon as you meet us on that ground we shall have no more wrangling over the subject, in my opinion.

Now, as to my political consistency, I simply have to remark that I do not pretend that I am consistent, and I think I might name a number of you over there, as my honorable friend from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] named this morning, who have changed party relations time and again. I am as consistent as some of you are. I was once a democrat, then for four years I was a republican; after that I became a democrat again, acting according to my own convictions. Some of you have had experience somewhat similar. Whether you have changed back again to the party you left or not, you have made changes, and important changes; you have modified your opinions. I have done the same thing, and I have acted with the organization that in my opinion it was best to act with. If you hold every man to consistency, you will find very few Senators here who can stand the test. I do not pretend that I have been consistent; if I were, I should be to-day fighting for slavery and for the right of secession. If I went on the Bourbon ground of never changing, which is called consistency, there is where I should stand. You may say that consistency does not require that, that consistency permits a man to act on his best judgment. Then I claim that I have been consistent. I think it is a man's duty to act on his best judgment in view of all the facts and circumstances by which he is surrounded. That is what I have tried to do. That which is expedient in statesmanship to-day may not be expedient twenty years hence. The man who says he never changes is a Bourbon in fact, and is not apt to be a wise man. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] informed us this morning that John P. Hale, Hannibal Hamlin, John Quincy Adams, John C. Calhoun, and other distinguished Americans, had some of them on more than one occasion changed their political relations. Doubtless they did so from conscientious conviction, and if I have changed mine I have acted on like convictions, and I at least find myself in distinguished company not only of that but of the present generation.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President, there are one or two suggestions and criticisms, and perhaps an inquiry or two, that I should be glad to make; but I hardly think it worth while to detain the Senate to-night.

Mr. DAWES. Will the Senator yield to me a moment?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. DAWES. I wish to say, Mr. President, that after listening to the interesting confession of the leader of the democratic side of the Chamber as to his disappointment in not receiving the consideration for what he alleges to have been a bargain made with the republican party at Chicago as the reason for going back and taking——

Mr. BROWN. I did not give any such reason for going back. The Senator from Massachusetts——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. DAWES. Yes, sir.

Mr. BROWN. The other evening when the question was asked me whether I did not think my life was not safe in Georgia at one time, I responded, qualifying my answer, by saying that for two years before I went back to the democracy I was as safe as any man in Georgia. Just after that the Senator got up, when I was talking with his colleague, so that I did not hear him, and made the statement substantially that the Senator from Georgia had stated that his life was not safe while he acted with the republicans, but when he got back to the democrats it was safe again, and then moved to adjourn. I do not choose to have the Senator take that sort of advantage again.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, is the Senator through?

Mr. BROWN. Yes, I have got through with that matter.

Mr. DAWES. I hope the Senator will hear me now.

Mr. BROWN. I simply want to say to you that I did not say that the political party with which I was allied in 1868 did not pay the consideration, and that I went back for that reason. I went back for no such reason. I got all I could have asked. I was appointed chief-justice of my State for twelve years; I resigned it after a little over two years. I have no right to complain, and I did not say I went back because the contract was not kept, for it would not be true, and it is not true if anybody else should say it.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, I will try to not misunderstand the Senator. I know the difficulty in understanding him. Perhaps if he will listen to my repetition of what I said——

Mr. HARRIS. I hope the Senator will speak loud enough for us to hear him on this side.

Mr. DAWES. I will try to speak loud enough. Perhaps if the Senator from Georgia will listen to a repetition of what I said, he will see that I have not misunderstood him. I said after having listened—he will tell me the moment I misstate him—to the confession of the leader of the other side of his disappointment——

Mr. BROWN. I did not confess that I was disappointed at all.

Mr. DAWES. Then, Mr. President, I take it that we are to infer that he did not mean when he got up on that platform to be understood as he said.

Mr. BROWN. Yes, sir; I meant all that I said.

Mr. DAWES. I so understood the Senator, and I am not to blame for assuming that the Senator was sincere. I will amend it now, and say that after having listened to the confession of the leader of the democratic side—I see he does not misunderstand me so far——

Mr. BROWN. You are wrong there. I am not the leader. It is impossible to get you right.

Mr. DAWES. After the confession of the fact, whether he was sincere or not—I leave that out—that he did not get the consideration for what he alleges was the understanding at Chicago, and also——

Mr. BROWN. I said no such thing.

Mr. DAWES. Let me state it all—and also his reasons in that connection for going back to the lead of the democratic party—now if he will tell me wherein I have misstated him, I will stop.

Mr. BROWN. There is not one word of what you have stated that represents me correctly.

Mr. DAWES. Then no mortal man can represent the Senator.

Mr. BROWN. I can be misrepresented, though, I discover, without any difficulty.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, I will amend the statement. After having tried to the utmost of my ability to understand and represent correctly the Senator from Georgia, the leader of the democratic party on that side of the Chamber——

Mr. BROWN. That is not correct.

Mr. DAWES. And having utterly failed myself to understand what he means, I do think it is time for us to adjourn and reflect upon it; and therefore I desire to make a suggestion in order that we may have ample time. The nation has erected a statue to a great naval hero which is to be unveiled in this city on Monday with appropriate ceremonies. I think it becomes the Senate of the United States, certainly if they shall at that time have fully understood the leader of the democratic side of the Senate, to adjourn over and attend those ceremonies; and therefore I move that the Senate do now adjourn until twelve o'clock on Tuesday next.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts moves that the Senate do now adjourn until twelve o'clock on Tuesday next.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask the Senator from Massachusetts to withhold his motion to adjourn over. I shall quite agree with him at the proper time, but not now. There is Saturday intervening, and the public business demands the attention of the Senate. I hope he will make his motion to adjourn until to-morrow, and on to-morrow when he makes his motion to adjourn over until Tuesday next for the reasons assigned by him, I shall quite agree with him and join him and support him.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, recollecting that the Senator from Tennessee yesterday, following his own impulses, voted to adjourn over then till next week, and only changed his vote because the mover of the motion had changed his mind, and not from his own judgment, I can hardly follow the Senator's suggestion. Therefore I adhere to my motion.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I desire to say to the Senator from Massachusetts that I conceded a great deal to the desire of the Senator who moved to adjourn over on yesterday; but when that Senator indicated a disposition to retire from the request he had made of the Senate, he left me no motive to adjourn over. While I am always ready to concede to a Senator on this floor anything that I can consistently concede to oblige him, when that Senator retired from his request I voted against adjourning over, and I am now opposed to adjourning over to-morrow because that is a day that we may utilize. For the reasons assigned by the Senator from Massachusetts I shall not hesitate to adjourn over Monday from to-morrow.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, the Senator from Tennessee, more I think than any other Senator, has moved to adjourn the whole proceeding till December. He has made so many motions of that kind that it is utterly impossible for me to follow him or for any other Senator who regards the business to do so. I must adhere to the motion.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I have moved to postpone the consideration of the resolution proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts till December, and I think it ought to be postponed to the end of eternity as well as to the end of time.

Mr. DAWES. That would take the Senator too.

Mr. HARRIS. But I have been ready every day and every hour of every day to proceed to the consideration of that business for which this session of the Senate was convened, as the Senator very well knows, and he has led the cohorts on the other side in opposing the consideration of the only business for which this session of the Senate was convened by the executive department of this Government.

Mr. DAWES. Now, Mr. President, I hope we may have a vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts, that the Senate do now adjourn until twelve o'clock, noon, on Tuesday next.

The motion was agreed to; and (at five o'clock and five minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned till Tuesday, the 26th instant.

TUESDAY, April 26, 1881.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday last was read and approved.

WESTERN JUDICIAL DISTRICT OF VIRGINIA.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter of the Attorney-General, transmitting, in compliance with the resolution of April 18, copies of correspondence received from Warren S. Lurty, United States attorney for the western district of Virginia, in relation to the late report of C. C. Lancaster, special agent of the Treasury Department; which was ordered to lie on the table.

BANKRUPTCY INVESTIGATION.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask the consent of the Senate that the Committee on the Judiciary have leave to sit during the recess of the Senate (if that should ever occur) and to employ a stenographer, the object being to pursue some investigations relating to the subject of bankruptcy during the recess.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection. There being no objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask also that the necessary expenses of the committee be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection. There being no objection, it is so ordered.

OFFICERS OF THE SENATE.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business of the last day's session, being the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] providing for the election of certain officers of the Senate, the pending question being on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] to postpone the resolution indefinitely, on which motion the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Missouri. [Putting the question.] The noes seem to have it.

Mr. COCKRELL. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BUTLER, (when his name was called.) On this subject I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON.]

Mr. CAMDEN, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. SAWYER.]

Mr. WALKER, (when Mr. GARLAND'S name was called.) My colleague [Mr. GARLAND] is paired with the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.] I make the announcement for the day.

Mr. GROVER, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. VAN WYCK.] I announce the pair for the day.

Mr. KELLOGG, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DAVIS.] If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. COKE, (when Mr. MAXEY'S name was called.) My colleague [Mr. MAXEY] is paired with the Senator from Colorado, [Mr. TELLER.] I make the announcement for the day.

Mr. SAUNDERS, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. WILLIAMS.] If he were here, I should vote "nay." I shall probably not announce the pair any more to-day, as the Senator from Kentucky is absent and will not be here.

Mr. SEWELL, (when his name was called.) I am paired with my colleague, [Mr. MCPHERSON.]

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. BLAIR, (after having voted in the negative.) I am paired with the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. JOHNSTON,] reserving only the right to vote to make a quorum. I withdraw my vote; it was given by accident.

Mr. FERRY, (after having voted in the negative.) I now recollect that I am paired with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] and I withdraw my vote.

Mr. BECK. I have been requested to announce that the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] is paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. MITCHELL.]

Mr. COCKRELL. I will announce for the day that my colleague [Mr. VEST] is absent at home on account of sickness in his family, and is paired with the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. PLUMB.]

The result was announced—yeas 24, nays 24; as follows:

So the motion to lay the resolution on the table was not agreed to.

[A message in writing was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries.]

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] to postpone the pending resolution indefinitely.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Mr. President, a few days ago I indicated to the Senate that it was my wish and purpose to make a few brief observations in reply to a portion of the speech delivered by the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] before his departure. I very much regret that the Senator from Maine is not now in his seat, for what I have to say I should prefer to utter in his presence.

He delivered a very remarkable speech for the Senate of the United States. It was remarkable in many respects: first, coming from an experienced legislator; secondly, because of the fact that it was calculated more than any public utterance that I have ever heard here to inflame the passions of the American people. I regret it, because I did not look for such a harangue from that quarter. It is true that he put the State which I in part represent to the front. He took occasion to allude to her local affairs, to her system of schools, her local government, and all that kind of thing, and drew a comparison between Florida and Massachusetts and some other States in the Union.

Those who know me in this body know very well that I have never been in the habit of casting reflections upon any of the States in this Union. I have never forgotton in my place in the Senate that I represent the whole country and that I am just as much a Senator of Massachusetts as I am of Florida. In all matters affecting the interests of this great people I shall always feel, or at least try to feel, that I am not here to draw comparisons between the respective States of this Union. I shall try to regard the country as a common whole, and myself as a common legislator having in view the interests of an entire people.

I was mortified, therefore, when I heard the Senator from Maine, no matter with what provocation he might have conceived himself justified in resorting to it, getting into a little, narrow groove and undertaking to disparage and to condemn what he could find objectionable in any quarter of his country.

I have but very little to say in regard to this matter. I was mortified at the time, I am mortified now, because when I found the Senator disposed to push forward that elevated civilization of which he boasts and the influence of which has been felt not only throughout this continent but the world, the civilization of New England, I was sorry to see that he presented such a poor type of it, when he felt it to be his duty to hold up any part of the United States to the condemnation of the world.

This country is a whole. The Union of these States must be dear to every man who has in him the attributes of a true statesman.

The Senator from Maine went on to draw a comparison between what he called the civilization of the North and the civilization of the South. The one he characterized as a civilization of the schoolbook and the Bible; the other the barbarism of slavery. I think the time has arrived when that kind of discussion ought to end. There was a time when party feeling and sectional prejudice ran so high in this Chamber that it might have been justified, but I think that time has passed.

Let us look at this matter for a moment. What is the civilization of the one or the other section of the country? They all emanated from a common source. In what differs the civilization of Massachusetts from the civilization of the South? They were both settled by a common stock of men. They both carried to this continent the same principles of liberty, the same notions of civil polity. It is true that the one landed on the James River, and the other at Plymouth; but they were all Englishmen, and they carried to this continent the same free principles, and they have taken root in a common soil.

Who was it that planted slavery on this continent? Who is responsible, I ask you, for that barbarism about which the Senator from Maine has said so much? Are the southern people responsible for it? Are the people of New England responsible for it? Is any portion of the people of this country responsible for it? I say not. It was planted here by a superior power. It was planted here by the mother country and upheld and maintained for years under the imperial power of Great Britain, and despite many honest exertions on the part of the colonies to rid themselves of it.

I will say to the Senator from Maine that no portion of the American people tried harder to stop the tide of barbarism, if he would call it that, than the people of the South. The very first movements made to check and to stop the introduction of slavery upon this continent came from the South, and they came from it even before Massachusetts or any New England State raised her voice, but without avail; and this system was planted here against the protest of every liberty-loving heart. Still the Senator comes forward here and says that the people of the South are to be regarded as forming a distinct civilization on this continent, because against their will and their wish this slave system was planted among them by a political power over which they had no control. It was here when the Revolution opened; it pervaded the whole country; it existed in Massachusetts and in every New England State. By degrees they got rid of it; not any sooner, I suppose, than was in accordance with their local interests. Nevertheless it was there. It lingered in the South a while longer than it did in the North, and for reasons that have been often stated here. Private interests possibly became interwoven with it so that it continued until a very recent period; but I do protest in all sincerity against this thing being set up here in the shape of a distinct civilization, and that the men of the South and the children of the South shall have branded upon their brows the brand of barbarism because they happened to be identified with slaveholding interests.

There was a time in the history of the world, and that was when the Saviour of man first put in His appearance upon the earth, that slavery in its worst form existed in the Roman Empire. When the Saviour of man made His appearance on the earth slavery in its most galling form existed within the Roman jurisdiction, and nothing can be found on record to-day emanating from Him or any of His apostles showing that a protest went out against it. He was more anxious to accommodate himself to the weaknesses and the prejudices of men, to spread forth the spirit of the Gospel than to run counter to the customs which He found ingrafted upon society when He first made His appearance upon earth. It was in that spirit that He uttered the celebrated scriptural saying that is so often alluded to, but so little understood: "Render, therefore," said He, "unto Cæsar the things which are Cæsar's; and unto God the things that are God's." He found slavery there in its worst form, not Africans bound in chains, not Indians wedded to captivity, but He found men of His own blood, for He came among us, as we know, in human form. He found men of the white race wedded and bound to a system of slavery the most galling that this world ever saw, and in the midst of all His teachings and His preachings, which to-day form the foundation of our Christian system, not one word can be found that emanated from Him in protest against this barbarous system.

We are now called upon by the Senator from Maine in the nineteenth century to bear the charge of being barbarians because the white masses of the South were compelled to submit to the introduction and long continuance of a system of labor which existed upon earth when God himself preached the Christian doctrine. I am not here for the purpose of making any apology or argument for it; I am not here to defend the right, abstract or otherwise, of man to hold property in man—it belongs to the past—but to-day in this high presence and in the hearing of the American people I say that the section from which I come is no more responsible for slavery or the consequences arising out of it than the people of any other State of the Union.

I would not undertake to antagonize the statesmanship of the Senator from Maine by the opinions of anybody, because I know that he is a very considerable man, but I would cite the opinion of a man who I would say, in all deference to the Senator from Maine, was equal to his own conception of himself when he announced on this floor that this continent was divided into two distinct civilizations. Who was that man? Where were our friends in the beginning of the great contest which culminated in the independence of this country? Where were the men who were outspoken in behalf of this struggling people? There was a time when there was something more necessary than mere physical power to enable this great people to accomplish what they succeeded in accomplishing in 1776 and in 1783. The public opinion of the world was appealed to. It was not only a battle of arms, but it was a great battle of moral forces, and without the support and sympathy which this country received from other quarters of the globe I am one of those who think that our independence never would have been achieved. It is true that we received material aid from France. She sent her armies and her generals here, and they participated in many of our great battles, notably in that of Yorktown, where I am proud to say the surrender of Cornwallis will be shortly commemorated by a monument worthy of the great event; but outside of the material advantage which was given to us in Europe we had the support of some of the greatest thinkers of that continent, we had the support of Mr. Burke, we had the support of Lord Chatham, and many like them, and they made a fight which is seldom made in behalf of a foreign people. Mr. Burke, in his place in the House of Commons, was called upon at one time to bear the whole brunt of the American contest; he had to meet every argument that was urged against the claims of this people to recognition as an independent power. He felt himself called upon to enter into a close and philosophical analysis of the condition of this continent and to present it to the mind of the world, and what did he say? Did he say, in the language of the Senator from Maine, that there were two orders of civilization existing here? Did he say that there was a civilization known as the civilization of the Bible and the school-book and the civilization of slavery, or rather the barbarism of slavery? In trying to attract sympathy and to secure support for the struggling Republic, did he in his high place in Parliament, with an eloquence never surpassed, undertake to say that this continent was divided in this way at that time, although slavery existed here then just as it existed before the civil war, possibly in a form more severe? Let me read a few lines from his great speech in defense of the colonies. In accounting for the spirit of freedom which was giving the mother country so much trouble he said:

> Sir, I can perceive by their manner that some gentlemen object to the latitude of this description, because in the southern colonies the Church of England forms a large body and has a regular establishment. It is certainly true. There is, however, a circumstance attending these colonies which in my opinion fully counterbalances this difference and makes the spirit of liberty still more high and haughty than in those to the northward. It is that in Virginia and the Carolinas they have a vast multitude of slaves. Where this is the case in any part of the world those who are free are by far the most proud and jealous of their freedom. Freedom to them is not only an enjoyment, but a kind of rank and privilege. Not seeing there that freedom as in countries where it is a common blessing and as broad and general as the air may be united with much abject toil, with great misery, with all the exterior of servitude, liberty looks among them like something that is more noble and liberal. I do not mean, sir, to commend the superior morality of this sentiment, which has at least as much pride as virtue in it; but I cannot alter the nature of man. The fact is so; and these people of the southern colonies are much more strongly, and with a higher and more stubborn spirit, attached to liberty than those to the northward.

I will put that authority against the authority of the Senator from Maine.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, may I ask the honorable Senator from Florida if he cites that passage of Burke as himself indorsing it and affirming its truth to-day, or does he believe with me that it contains as much falsehood, crowded into half a dozen lines, in principle as was ever put together by the genius of man?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I do not believe there is any falsehood in it.

Mr. HOAR. Does the Senator now affirm that liberty exists in greater purity among the masters of slaves, being founded upon a distinction of rank and caste, and not upon justice? Does he believe that the affirmation of the opening sentences of the Declaration of Independence or this affirmation of Burke which he has cited speaks the truth——

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I did not yield for a speech.

Mr. HOAR. Now that is the question I should like to ask.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I yielded for a question. I undertake to put the opinion of a great political philosopher, one of the strongest liberty-loving men that ever trod the earth, a man who did more in his day and generation for this people than any man who lived beyond the confines of its territory—I undertake to put his opinion against the opinion of the Senator from Maine on whose speech I was commenting. The Senator from Massachusetts has no right to call for any abstract opinions of mine. This is a question of the past. I believe that the observations of Mr. Burke were founded in true philosophy. He gives evidence of it a little further on, and I will cite it, when he says that what was stated in his speech was true in all the ancient commonwealths from the time we had any idea of government in the world.

Sir, when the great contest for independence began there was as much ground and reason for drawing the parallel, far more in reality than exists to-day.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator pardon me? I took the liberty of asking him whether he indorsed this statement, which he has, as I understand, indorsed, because it seems to me a very interesting question. I understand, if the Senator will pardon me for saying it, that the Senator has stated the precise issue which divides the two sides of this Chamber and the two parties of this country to-day, and we accept it.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Mr. President, my opinion would be worth very little upon a question which is no longer practicable; and if I have deprecated anything more than another it has been the bringing forward here by Senators of a question which ought to be considered as obsolete; but when we come to indulge in a system of reasoning respecting it, it is perfectly legitimate to put the opinion of Mr. Burke against the opinion of Mr. FRYE. The world recognizes the one as a thinker and a statesman. How far the thoughts of the other will ever travel beyond the territorial jurisdiction of his own State or country remains to be seen.

But, sir, nothing mortified me more than to find this question brought forward here at this time in connection with this senatorial dead-lock as it has been called. When Washington put in an appearance at Cambridge to command the shattered forces of the colonies he was a slaveholder. Did any man in New England at that time undertake to impeach him because he was connected with that denounced civilization? He was connected with the barbarism of slavery for he was a slaveholder at that very time, and he commanded the men of New England in that great contest, and they yielded ready and implicit obedience to his commands throughout the trying days of the Revolution notwithstanding that he was a great Virginia barbarian.

At the very time that Thomas Jefferson penned the Declaration of Independence he was a slaveholder. The immortal lines which are celebrated now nearly every year in New England emanated from a man who was identified with that barbarism. Why was it that no protest went forth to the civilized world against perpetuating the language and the worth of a man who was so identified with this abominable system? And still there was not an intelligent man on this continent who did not know at the time Jefferson wrote those immortal lines that he was the owner of slaves and that he continued so down to the very day of his death? And who, I ask you, in the whole scope of political operations on this continent ever did more to advance liberty, to promote the country's prosperity, its well-being, and its consequence than that immortal man? Look at the history of the Revolution, and see who were identified with it who were in the same category with Jefferson.

Now, Mr. President, it is too late in the day for any man from New England to come forward here and undertake to brand the brows of southern men with this foul imputation that they are connected with a barbarism with which Madison, Jefferson, Washington, Marshall, all the leading spirits of the purest and best days of the Republic had been identified, and for no other purpose under God's heaven but to excite the hate and enmity of that portion of our people who may not have given to that subject the reflection which it demands.

Many of us are disposed to boast of our English ancestry, and the pride of race; and that carries us back to other times and other countries that after all have been responsible for this whole system; unfortunate it was. Glancing my eye over the records of the past, looking into parliamentary annals, I go back to that time when Great Britain was brought face to face with the great problem of slavery in her West India colonies, and I do not find in any parliamentary record any statesman of a responsible character rising up and saying in the presence of the British people that one-half of them were barbarians and living under a system of barbarism that called for parliamentary repression. I do not find Mr. Canning, Mr. Wilberforce, or Mr. O'Connell even, in all the wild luxuriance of his notions of liberty, denouncing anybody living under the British flag as being a barbarian because it fell to his lot to be identified with the system of slavery. I find many honest expressions of opinion, however, from time to time looking to the necessity, the importance of a change in that system, looking to the enactment of wise laws necessary to its gradual extinction, but I find in no part of the excited debates that took place in the British Parliament at the time when slavery was the most exciting topic in that country, anything indicating that there was a statesman worthy of the name who denounced a British subject because he lived in a portion of the realm where slavery existed. I do not find that narrowness, that littleness of soul, that want of charity in that country at that time which I see here.

Let me read an extract from a speech delivered by George Canning in the British Parliament, a man whose whole soul was on the side of freedom, who from time to time avowed in the most positive and unmistakable terms that if it came to a question of slavery and freedom he was always to be found on the side of freedom; and occupying the responsible position of a British minister and speaking to the free opinion of Great Britain from his responsible place in Parliament he did not think it becoming in him to play the part of a demagogue. When the all-absorbing question of the abolition of slavery in the West India Islands agitated the British Parliament we know—those of us at least who have read the history of that affair—the excitement that it created, the questions of property that were involved, the rights of subjects, all those nice and delicate questions that were brought to the front, even here, were presented there, and it was known that if there was an abolitionist of deeper or darker dye than another in the British Empire it was George Canning; and what did he say? He said:

> If there be those again who think that this important question, involving, as it confessedly does, the lives, the interests, and the property of our fellow-subjects, is to be determined on the abstract proposition "That man cannot be made the property of man," I take the liberty of relegating them to the schools; and of telling them that they do not deal with this grave and complicated matter as members of the British Parliament, or as members of a society constituted like that in which we live, of long-established interests, of conflicting claims to protection, of modifications and involutions of property, not to be changed and simplified by a sudden effort, and of usages which, however undesirable, if the question were as to their new institution, are too inveterately rooted to be destroyed at a single blow. I must tell them, sir, that the practical adoption of their speculative notions would expose our West India possessions to ravage and desolation; which, I think, those honorable gentlemen themselves would be as little satisfied to behold as, I hope, they are prepared willfully to produce them.

That was the sentiment of a great statesman recognizing the claims of freedom and the universal right of man to be free, but nevertheless accommodating himself to a condition of society which he had no agency in bringing about and which it was the part of wisdom to change as moderately, as silently, and as quietly as possible, and without intruding upon the interests of a great people.

I am not here, as I said, to offer any argument in the abstract in support of the doctrine that man has the right to hold property in man. If that were an original question and we were debating it here for the first time, and a proposition was pending to establish it, I have no hesitation in saying that I would be the last man in this continent who would give it my assent; but when it comes to dealing with questions now long past, with a state of facts over which the people of the South had no control, which was forced upon them by a superior power and which they were compelled to accommodate themselves to as best they could, they need no defense from me before any fair tribunal.

Slavery has passed away, and there is not a man to-day south of the Potomac who does not rejoice at it, in my opinion, although I am not here delegated to speak for every one. I speak for myself, and I say that I think I represent the sentiment of the entire South when I say that there is not a man, a woman, or a child within the confines of the southern country who would be willing to take back that institution. Why not, then, let the past alone? A great philosopher has said that it is not in the power of the Almighty even to undo the past. I say it is not the part of decency or of statesmanship for any Senator from any quarter of this Union to come forth here even for party or political purposes to dig up the carcass of slavery to inflame and excite the public mind. I say that every interest in those States, North and South, ought to be regarded as lying within the guardianship and the control and the protection of every member of this body, and when a Senator from New England or a Senator from any other portion of the Union gets up here to denounce any portion of the American people because of some system of the past, I say that he is serving in a very small way the great purposes of his high office.

A great revolution has been accomplished; a great change has taken place. This people have been transformed from chattels into freemen, by the scratch of the pen; and while I say it is beyond the power of any man or any set of men to alter or change that condition of things, I do say here to-day, measuring my words when I utter them, that the process by which that great end was accomplished was the most unwise act of statesmanship that was ever enacted in any country. There was not a thinking man in the southern country that did not believe that with the success of the war on the side of the Union slavery would cease; not one. Whatever may have been the questions or doubts entering into the minds of men as regards its importance as a factor in bringing the war about, everybody felt that when the cause of the South went down in the flame of battle slavery went down with it, and that it required the hand of a master statesman to regulate and to reform society so that the great interests of the country might not be damaged by this new condition of things. We did not complain of emancipation so much, because it was anticipated, but even under the Johnson governments in the South the people there, with a unanimity which they rarely accorded to any public measure, ratified the complete extinction of slavery.

This was not enough. After that the great and the fatal step had to be taken. On your statute-books to-day you require the most enlightened European to remain five years within your jurisdiction before you will permit him to enjoy the privileges of common citizenship, in order that he may prepare himself by reading, by culture, by all those methods which go to swell his mind to the full dimensions of American citizenship—you require five years of him before he can be permitted to enjoy the rights of a common citizen. In the other case what did you do? You insisted that a people who for more than two centuries were involved in the most benighted barbarism, without any schooling, without any training, without any preparation whatever, should be by the scratch of a pen, and by the accident of birth, elevated to the full standard of American citizens. At the time you did that you might just as well have extended the ballot to so many of the cattle of the region in which those people lived. They were as incapable of forming any idea of the duties, the rights, and the responsibilities of American citizenship as the beasts of the field. And this you boast of as a great public measure; this is the crowning glory of an administration of the republican party! Then you expected that the men who for generations before that had their souls and their hearts identified with the principles of freedom should bow their necks beneath the yoke of these Africans that you attempted to raise above them; and you expected them, as Americans, as men of your own flesh and blood, with all the traditions of the past behind them, to bow their heads beneath this huge force of negro barbarism and crouch in the dust before it as a political power. They revolted. History will write that chapter, and justice will yet be done after the prejudices of this hour have passed away, and when some future Macaulay or Gibbon comes to write the history of that transaction it will be found that the men of the South, upon whom you were in the habit of heaping your anathemas because they would not submit to this negro domination, will be vindicated in the eyes of mankind.

It was an unreasonable thing to expect; and what has been the whole current of this debate? What has been the genius of this strife, so to speak, except this very question, because those men who from time immemorial have been accustomed to freedom have not been willing to accept the rule of an inferior race. Take my own State with 96,000 blacks and 100,000 whites; what a spectacle does it present for the contemplation of a statesman? Do you think that an act of legislation can blot out the colors in the rainbow? Do you think that it can reverse the revolutions of the earth? Do you think it can change in any way the established order of nature? You might as well, to use the language of a great thinker, stamp your foot upon the earth to try to prevent its revolution; you would only remain a silly figure upon its surface who measured the rapidity of rotation until carried in the shade of that body whose irresistible force you would endeavor to oppose.

Nature and God for their own purposes have established an order and you have run your orders and your legislation right under the nose of the Almighty; you have refused to recognize what nature had established; you have insisted upon carrying out and maintaining in the South a condition of things that could only be maintained and upheld in a community where races were homogeneous, and you have blamed the men of your own belief and your own faith and your own feelings and aspirations because they had the manhood and the spirit to resent the attempt.

Sir, I have heard and read a good deal of oppression and of tyranny, and I say it here in the Senate of the United States, under all the responsibility that attaches to anything I can utter, that knowing the South as I have from my earliest boyhood, and her generosity, I never expected to live to see the day when that proud and haughty race would be compelled, as I have seen them, to humiliate themselves as they have. I never expected to see the day when such scenes would be enacted, such as I have witnessed with my own eyes, when thoughtless and ignorant men, inspired by nothing but race feeling, would take possession of the polls and offer every insult and indignity possible to their white neighbors in order to produce conflict; and I have seen that proud people, conscious of their manhood, knowing what they could do, bear with these taunts and humiliations for the sake of order to a degree that I never thought was possible.

And this thing was all predicted by republican authority, and I would ask the Secretary to read a portion of Governor Morton's address to the Legislature in Indiana in 1865 to show what he thought of the wisdom of this system about which so much has been said in this debate.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

> The subject of suffrage is, by the national Constitution, expressly referred to the determination of the several States, and it cannot be taken from them without a violation of the letter and spirit of that instrument.
> But without stopping to discuss theories or questions of constitutional law, and leaving them out of view, it would, in my opinion, be unwise to make the work of reconstruction depend upon a condition of such doubtful utility as negro suffrage.
> It is a fact so manifest that it should not be called in question by any, that a people who are just emerging from the barbarism of slavery are not qualified to become a part of our political system, and take part, not only in the government of themselves and their neighbors, but of the whole United States. So far from believing that negro suffrage is a remedy for all of our national ills I doubt whether it is a remedy for any, and rather believe that its enforcement by Congress would be more likely to subject the negro to a merciless persecution than to confer upon him any substantial benefit. By some it is thought that suffrage is already cheap enough in this country; and the immediate transfer of more than a half million of men from the bonds of slavery, with all the ignorance and degradation upon them which the slavery of generations upon southern fields has produced, would be a declaration to the world that the exercise of American suffrage involves no intellectual or moral qualifications, and that there is no difference between an American freeman and an American slave which may not be removed by a mere act of Congress.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. So it seems, Mr. President, that opinion was not altogether on the democratic side with respect to the unwisdom of granting this wholesale suffrage so suddenly. When the responsible and thoughtful Senator from Indiana in his day, addressing himself to the Legislature of his State, thought proper to put that language to his people, I am sure it cannot be regarded as any very great crime for a democrat to entertain such opinions.

But I said that the past is beyond the power of the Almighty, and we accept the situation in good faith. Every man of sense knows the difference between the original institution of a measure and its subsequent abrogation; and whatever may have been the opinions of those of us who deemed this an unwise policy at the time, there is not a man in the South to-day of intelligence but what feels that it is his duty to make the best of the situation and that nobody there for one moment entertains the thought of remitting those people to the condition in which they were.

It is true, I am free to say to you in all candor, that I never would have advocated the extension of suffrage at the time it was granted. I would have put them in a state of probation and culture, of preparation like that in which you put the foreigners who come to your shores, and I would have required of them the same preparatory training that your laws now require from the most cultivated European, before I would have endowed them with the rights and powers of citizens.

But that is past and we must deal with this as an existing fact; and let me tell you that the rights which those people enjoy to-day and the security which they have is not altogether derived from the amendments to the Constitution, although they are thereby protected. The interest of the people with whom they are identified is their greatest security. There is not a man, woman, or child in the South who looks on a black man or a black woman there who does not know that their interests are identified more or less with those people; and it is not for you who have not this problem before you from day to day to come in as intermeddling outsiders and undertake to prescribe for us the rule of action which shall control in our midst. It would be as impudent for the people of my State to go to Massachusetts or to Maine to dictate to the thoughtful men of those States what should be done with respect to their domestic policy and the regulation of their local affairs, as it is for you who have not on your hands this great and difficult problem to come into our midst and quarrel with us over every little detail pertaining to it. Why not let us alone? Ought you not to be satisfied with the condition of the South? Present me an instance in the history of the world in which a people under such difficulties, surrounded by such dangers, and in the midst of such poverty, have marked out the result that that people have. I defy you. I say that the history of the world will not afford an instance where so much has been accomplished under such great disadvantages as has been accomplished there; and you ought to be content that this great experiment of enfranchising four millions of slaves by a scratch of the pen was not attended with greater ruin and more fearful consequences to society than those which did occur.

Every day in this body you talk about the denial of suffrage to and of impositions upon the negroes. I venture to say that the civilized world to-day does not present a spectacle to be compared with that of the South, so far as those laboring people are concerned, in contentment, in the enjoyment of the security of every right that they ought to have as humble members of society, and marked as they are by a distinct brand of nature which shuts them out and will continue to shut them out forever from places of social position with the white race.

The Senator from Maine, when he came up here the other day to speak of the condition of Florida, said that he had in his hand an immense record taken from the Attorney-General's Office—the records of the courts in political cases. Well, sir, I know something of the administration of criminal justice in those cases. I have seen enough and with my own eyes to satisfy me that when it comes to politics a judicial tribunal affords no more security than a political one to the rights and interests of the masses; I saw with my own eyes and in my own presence the solemn verdict of a jury set aside by a Federal judge because it did not suit his notions, and twelve negroes empaneled to give a judgment that was in accordance with the judge's notion! I will not go to judicial annals for any evidences of impartiality in matters wherein the political parties are involved. I would read a passage from a great republican speech of Mr. Sumner. He embodies in it a spirit of philosophy.

> For myself, let me say, that I hold judges, and especially the Supreme Court of the country, in much respect; but I am too familiar with the history of judicial proceedings to regard them with any superstitious reverence. [Sensation.] Judges are but men, and in all ages have shown a full share of human frailty. Alas! alas! the worst crimes of history have been perpetrated under their sanction. The blood of martyrs and of patriots, crying from the ground, summons them to judgment. It was a judicial tribunal which condemned Socrates to drink the fatal hemlock, and which pushed the Saviour barefoot over the pavements of Jerusalem, bending beneath His cross. It was a judicial tribunal which, against the testimony and entreaties of her father, surrendered the fair Virginia as a slave; which arrested the teachings of the great Apostle to the Gentiles, and sent him in bonds from Judea to Rome; which, in the name of the old religion, adjudged the saints and fathers of the Christian Church to death, in all its most dreadful forms, and which, afterward, in the name of the new religion, enforced the tortures of the Inquisition, amidst the shrieks and agonies of its victims, while it compelled Galileo to declare—in solemn denial of the great truth he had disclosed—that the earth did not move round the sun. It was a judicial tribunal which, in France, during the long reign of her monarchs, lent itself to be the instrument of every tyranny as during the brief reign of terror it did not hesitate to stand forth the unpitying accessory of the unpitying guillotine. Ay, sir, it was a judicial tribunal in England, surrounded by all the forms of law, which sanctioned every despotic caprice of Henry the Eighth from the unjust divorce of his queen to the beheading of Sir Thomas More; which lighted the fires of persecution that glowed at Oxford and Smithfield, over the cinders of Latimer, Ridley, and John Rogers; which, after elaborate argument, upheld the fatal tyranny of ship-money against the patriot resistance of Hampden; which, in defiance of justice and humanity, sent Sidney and Russell to the block; which persistently enforced the laws of conformity that our Puritan fathers persistently refused to obey; and which, afterward, with Jeffreys on the bench, crimsoned the pages of English history with massacre and murder—even with the blood of innocent women. Ay, sir, and it was a judicial tribunal in our own country, surrounded by all the forms of law, which hung witches at Salem—which affirmed the constitutionality of the Stamp Act while it admonished "jurors and the people" to obey.

Sir, that is true, and when gentlemen come up here and talk to me about the decision of judicial tribunals in Florida or anywhere else with respect to questions in which the interests of party are involved, I point them to that passage in Mr. Sumner's great speech.

Now, sir, I did not intend to say much in regard to the local affairs of my State, but the Senator from Maine in his over-anxiety to fasten upon the people of the South some charge or accusation that would affect them in the mind of the northern people, their own fellow-citizens, referred to a murder which was committed a few months ago while the testimony was being taken in a contested election over a seat in the other House. I can only say now, Mr. President, that after he got on his feet, so ill-informed in regard to that transaction and so willing to use it against that people, that I was really surprised, because I supposed that when a Senator felt it to be his duty to arraign the people of any of the States of this Union, so as to put them in a light which might call for the condemnation of their fellow-citizens elsewhere, he would at least take pains to inform himself in regard to the facts of the case. He entered on a long statement, saying that he meant to give names, and he spoke of murder, he spoke of the fact that it had been circulated over the North that murder was in the air in Florida at the time this testimony was being taken so as to prevent honest testimony being given in favor of one of the parties, and what was the fact? The fact was that it was a murder committed by a negro desperado of his own party upon one of the very best young white men in Florida, who, without cause and without justification, was shot down in cold blood by a negro villain; and so anxious were a certain class of men who hover around this Capitol to misrepresent and to defame that people, that they actually telegraphed to the New York papers that this murder was inspired by democrats, and the Senator from Maine the other day had the temerity to allude to it as a murder committed by a democrat upon a republican, when in reality it was a murder committed by a negro villain upon one of the best young men in the country, and without cause or justification.

What must be the condition of a people, I say, when the advocates of a party assume a position like that, when they are willing to resort to such a perversion of truth in order to create hostility in the northern mind against an innocent and unoffending people? Now, sir, I want the Clerk to read a leading article in one of the democratic papers in relation to an event that was referred to, the capture of a train. I have no apology to make here for any lawlessness; none whatever, and when this thing occurred to which reference was made, I mean the taking off the train of some prisoners there, it was an act of lawlessness which was denounced at the time by the leading democratic press in the State, denounced by every open-spoken man in the State. We do not know who did the crime, whether they were republicans or democrats; but that is the way in which the leading democratic paper spoke of the transaction at the time it occurred.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

UNJUSTIFIABLE LAWLESSNESS.

On Tuesday last, at Madison, a United States deputy marshal arrested Messrs. William H. Dial, O. F. Florrid, Sylvanus M. Hankins, George W. Walker, and John Brady, charged with violating the Federal election laws. Just as the train started with the marshal and his prisoners aboard it was boarded by a number of armed and disguised persons who ordered the prisoners out of the car, having disarmed the marshal and ordered him to proceed on the train.

We are further advised that a number of the most prominent citizens of Madison, as soon as the intelligence of the affair reached them, made haste to deprecate the occurrence, and sent telegrams to that effect to Jacksonville. The parties who had been placed under arrest by the deputy marshal themselves protested against the interference of the mob, and declared themselves willing to obey the writs, and they proceeded to take the next train for Jacksonville, where they surrendered themselves to the authorities and underwent preliminary examination, the charges against them being for illegally voting more than one ballot at the recent election.

The perpetrators of this high-handed offense against law and order are as yet unknown. They have committed a crime against the laws of the land which all right-minded people will condemn, and invited the bitter vituperation of the worst enemies of the State, the radical press North and South. It matters not that the act was done by reckless persons, such as may be found in every community in the land, or that it is condemned by every citizen of the State save those engaged in it. The cry of "Ku Klux" is already raised, and the reputation of Florida for peacefulness, good order, and loyalty to law and justice is imperiled.

The four gentlemen who proceeded to Jacksonville to surrender themselves to the authorities were Messrs. Dial, Florrid, Hankins, and Brady; the remaining one of the five was too unwell to do so, but sent word that he would do so as soon as he was able. The four named above appeared before the United States commissioner, but it appearing that the witnesses for the prosecution were not present, the defendants by their counsel waived examination and gave bond in $500 each for their appearance at court.

These gentlemen subsequently published the following card:

To the public:

That we may be placed right upon the record, and the good people of Madison County presented in their true attitude, we deem it proper to give expression to our views and make a presentation of the facts connected with the recent unwarranted rescue of ourselves from the custody of Deputy United States Marshal Shalley.

We deprecate and condemn the illegal action of these self-constituted protectors, and regard their action as not only hurtful and injurious to the State at large, but as unkind to us. And while giving utterance to our sentiments in this respect we wish to give the public to understand that we not only did not have any preknowledge of, or give any aid to, these masked persons in the accomplishment of their purpose, but we did not even remain passive instruments to be moved at their volition. On the contrary, these invaders behaved with such rudeness and evident malignity, accompanied with such a liberal display of arms, as to impress us with the belief that their purpose was to take our lives.

Our departure from the train was forced and against our will and wish. Confident that we were not guilty of any violation of the laws of the land, we were perfectly willing to meet the charges made against us and anxious for a speedy hearing, knowing that it would result in our triumphant acquittal. We repudiate and censure the course of these masked men and disavow any knowledge of their identity, and sincerely believe that they do not belong to those who are known as our friends.

In addition we desire to say that the citizens of Madison County do not countenance lawless proceedings, and are as quick to punish wrong-doing as the citizens of any other county where a conscientious regard for law and order prevails. And we can safely say that if the presence of any of her citizens is desired at the United States court, they will not only respect and obey the process of that court, but will respond of their own motion upon the receipt of a telegram or letter of that purport. They have nothing to fear from the courts and only ask a fair hearing.

W. H. DIAL.
O. F. FLORRID.
JOHN W. BRADY.
S. M. HANKINS.

JACKSONVILLE, FLORIDA, November 11, 1880.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Mr. President, a good deal has been said on another subject, and indeed it has been made the text for all the lengthy speeches that have been made here during this executive session, as it should be, "a free ballot and a fair count;" and it has occurred to me that some of those gentlemen who were so well informed in regard to the past might with profit have brought up to view some of the notable transactions that occurred in 1876 in connection with "a free ballot and a fair count."

I read the other day in my place in the Senate a lengthy extract from the message of the governor of Florida, a republican governor, the last one that we had, and he a gentleman from Maine originally, Governor Stearns, in which he stated in the most pointed terms under a republican administration there that there had been no denial of right to anybody. The very last words that he said to the Legislature in the State over which he presided as governor, to his credit as an honest man, partisan as he was, he came out and in that public paper he exonerated every citizen of the State from any connection or complicity with lawlessness or violence. I do not want to repeat myself now by reiterating what I then read, but I will put what Governor Stearns said to the Legislature in Florida in 1874 against anything which the Senator from Maine uttered in his place the other day.

It is true that we had precipitated upon us an emergency in 1876; the government of Florida was in republican hands at that time; every officer in the State was an appointee of a republican governor, and I say here that that government is the most autocratic on the face of the earth to-day. We are living under a constitution which was framed in Chicago and imposed upon that people at the point of Federal bayonets; the hands and feet of every thinking man in that Commonwealth were tied, and that infamous organic law was established over them by republican partisans. They were not permitted to exercise their voice in saying whether they would have it or not, but by negro votes and the votes of a few adventurers that infamous constitution as it stands to-day was fastened upon the free spirit of that people. Under it the governor has power to appoint every officer, high and low, from a justice of the peace to a supreme judge. There are only two classes of officers elective within the State. Under this constitution of Florida, this liberty-loving constitution, if I may be excused in using that phrase, they elect members of the Legislature and constables. The governor appoints the district and county judges—the former confirmed by the Legislature, it is true—justices of the peace, sheriffs, clerks, election officers, everything. The whole machinery of government under this constitution is in the hands of the governor of Florida; and it stands to-day an exception to every organic law of the Union.

That constitution, let me tell the Senate, was put upon the people while the men of intelligence and of property were tied hand and foot. They were not permitted to express an opinion upon it. A few thousand poor ignorant men who had just emerged from bondage, dictated to and presided over by a few men who had no identity with the people, fastened upon the people of that State that organic law, and there it stands to-day. They had an election under it in 1876, and every one of the election officers was an appointee of the republican governor. At every election place in the whole State there were two republicans and one democrat to preside over the election, and to certify the returns to the board of final revision. What was the result? There was not a single democratic ballot put into a ballot-box in Florida in 1876 (as my friend from Georgia near me [Mr. BROWN] will know, because he was there at the canvass of the election) that did not go into a ballot-box under republican supervision without any terrorism, without any intimidation, without any fact being brought to bear to show to anybody that a single citizen had been deprived of a single right.

Those returns were certified under local law to the board of final supervision, and how did they stand on the face of those returns? Compare the population of that little Commonwealth with the vote as recorded in 1876, and a more honest and more fair exhibition of American suffrage cannot be found in the United States. On the face of those returns, all prepared by republican officials and sent to the final board for addition, (not for manipulation, but for addition,) the vote stood 24,440 democratic and 24,349 republican on the electoral ticket. These were the ballots actually deposited in the ballot-boxes of the State, under officers who were sworn to administer the local law, each one of whom took a solemn oath to discharge his duty to his country and to his God. After they made up these returns and certified them to the State board under all the formalities of law, and a republican canvassing authority came to deal with them, it was found that the electors for Samuel J. Tilden, in the interest of the democratic party, had 95 majority on the face of the record.

Where was the authority then to put any hand into that sacred ballot-box? You talk about a fair ballot and a free count. Who gave to Mr. Samuel B. McLin and his co-conspirators the power to roll up their sleeves and put their hands into the ballot-boxes and take out 2,000 ballots that had been deposited under all the forms of law and treat them as pieces of waste paper? Where did they get that authority? Under what law or Constitution of the Union, local or general? I appeal to republican Senators, for I know that within many of their breasts beat impulses of fairness, and I ask where they got authority to go down into the ballot-boxes of my State, sealed up under republican authority and forwarded to the seat of government, and to say "there are 2,000 ballots in here that should go for nothing?" And they did it, and by that means secured a presidential title. Without that, Mr. Hayes never could have been President of the United States, but it was necessary that this great fraud should be perpetrated.

In order to secure the presence of a military force to support and sustain those men who perpetrated this outrage an excuse had to be framed to bring three hundred soldiers to surround the capitol of my own State, under the command of a general officer. What was the excuse? They looked in vain to the Federal Constitution and to the acts of 1790 and 1791 to find authority for invoking Federal assistance to enable them to consummate this great fraud. They found that in case of rebellion or invasion the executive of a State when the Legislature was not in session might invoke Federal assistance. They looked at the act of 1790 to try and find something to justify such a position, but there was nothing there. What do you suppose was the ground of their application? A train of cars ran off the track between two points in Florida—Jacksonville and Tallahassee—and it was alleged to have been the act of some conspirators—as false an imputation as ever was put forth against an honest people. The running off of that train in the night-time, and as I believe from design to subserve a base purpose, was made the groundwork of a formal application on the part of the executive of Florida to the President of the United States to furnish them troops to put down sedition and rebellion. This was a few days in advance of the movement, and it was necessary that the military should be there. Three hundred men who had braved dangers on the battle-field, who had served their country in many forms and ways, were sent there under the command of a general officer. Never shall I forget the day I talked with that mortified man and the feelings of mortification which he manifested when he learned the true object of his mission. He was not there to put down sedition, he was not there to trample upon rebellion, but he was there to crush the life-blood out of a free and an honest people; he was there to trample upon the institutions of his country; to see that the two men who held in their hands the presidential office of this great country might be supported in the commission of the most villainous fraud that ever was committed upon this continent. They were there for that purpose, and that enabled them to consummate their purpose. Was this in accordance with the free spirit of our people? Was this a fair count? Is there an American citizen to-day anxious for the preservation of the institutions of his country who after surveying the record in regard to Florida, and knowing all the circumstances of that case, will say that that count of Tallahassee in 1876 in which 2,000 ballots were trampled under foot and the voice of the people stifled, is in accordance with the free spirit of our Constitution?

If the majority had been the other way honestly no man would have contended for it more than I would have done; but as a free citizen, anxious to see the labor and genius of those people survive, and knowing that there is no honest way to perpetuate it except a free ballot, I shall frown with indignation and disapprobation upon all efforts of this kind.

The fraud was perpetuated and the military returned. What a spectacle! Three hundred men in the uniform of the Army of the United States surrounding the State-house, with the tent of a general officer in the middle, to see that two men intrusted with the compilation of the local ballots of the people had trampled upon their voice; and they did it. There is not an honest man in the United States who would do that. They got their reward. Then think of the speeches made here by gentlemen who are anxious about a free ballot and fair count. Why did they not accept their own returns from their own officers? Every return that went to Tallahassee in that election was the work of a republican official and verified the vote of the State as actually cast.

When the republican supreme court came to deal with this question in another form it seated Drew, the democrat, by a process of mandamus upon the same vote by which the electors cast their vote for Mr. Hayes. George F. Drew was made governor under the decision of the supreme court which compelled that recreant board in the gubernatorial contest to count the ballots for the office of governor, but they declined the offer to have the power to count them for the electors, and left them at the very same vote which has gone forth to the world as the foundation of the title of George F. Drew for the office of governor of Florida for four years, and which went forth in support of the title and the unqualified right of Samuel J. Tilden.

Mr. President, I have already detained the Senate longer than I intended, but less I could not have said upon this subject to present it in a fair light.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. HARRIS in the chair.) The question is on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee to indefinitely postpone the resolution, upon which motion the yeas and nays have been ordered. Is the Senate ready for the question?

Mr. PENDLETON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is moved by the Senator from Ohio that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. [Putting the question.] The Chair is in doubt as to the result.

Mr. PENDLETON. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. RANSOM, (when Mr. LAMAR'S name was called.) The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. LAMAR] and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] are paired to-day.

Mr. SHERMAN, (when his name was called.) I am paired for to-day with the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. LAMAR.]

Mr. SLATER, (when his name was called.) On this vote I am paired with the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. PLATT.] If he were here he would vote "nay" and I should vote "yea."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. COKE, (after having voted in the affirmative.) I withdraw my vote. I am paired with the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. INGALLS.]

Mr. BECK, (after having voted in the affirmative.) I desire to ask if the vote of the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] is recorded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is not recorded.

Mr. BECK. I withdraw my vote. I am paired with him when he is absent.

Mr. COCKRELL. This morning I voted inadvertently. I am paired with the Senator from Maine, [Mr. FRYE.] The pair had escaped my recollection entirely. As it will not change the result of the vote, I hope I shall be permitted by unanimous consent to withdraw my vote on both the yeas and nays heretofore called. I should vote "yea" on this question if I were not paired, but I am paired with the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] and the pair will continue during his absence.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. When the pending motion shall have been disposed of the Chair will entertain the request of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. BLAIR. I am paired with the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. JOHNSTON.]

The result was announced—yeas 21, nays 21; as follows:

YEAS—21.

Brown,	Gorman,	Jonas,	Vance,
Call,	Groome,	Jones of Florida,	Voorhees,

So the Senate refused to proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. DAWES. The Senate having decided that they will not go into executive session, having decided that they will not indefinitely postpone the resolution, and having also decided they will not postpone it to any future day certain, I trust the Senate will now take a vote upon the resolution.

Mr. COCKRELL. Will not the Senator from Massachusetts please withhold that very earnest request until I can ask the Senate unanimously to consent to the withdrawal of my vote?

Mr. DAWES. I understood that the Senator's request was granted.

Mr. COCKRELL. It has not been.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair stated to the Senator from Missouri that when the pending question was disposed of he would entertain the Senator's request.

Mr. DAWES. I beg pardon.

Mr. COCKRELL. Now I make the request that I may have permission to withdraw my vote, having voted inadvertently. It does not change the result.

Mr. DAWES. I hope there will be no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri asks unanimous consent of the Senate to withdraw his vote upon the two previous roll-calls mentioned by him. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The request is granted, and the votes are withdrawn.

Mr. DAWES. Now, Mr. President, I renew my appeal to the Senate to proceed to the pending business, the Senate having decided in all possible shapes that they will not postpone further action upon this resolution.

Mr. COCKRELL. Now, Mr. President, in order to afford the Senator from Massachusetts a little rest from his laborious efforts, I move to lay the whole matter on the table.

Mr. DAWES. Nothing would so conduce to that rest as to take a vote on the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri moves that the resolution do lie on the table. [Putting the question.] The noes appear to have it.

Mr. COCKRELL called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 22, nays 22; as follows:

YEAS—22.

Brown,	George,	Jackson,	Ransom,

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. GROOME. I renew the motion to proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. DAWES. I renew my appeal to the other side.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maryland has moved that the Senate do now proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. DAWES. Why, Mr. President, they have just voted that they would not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. COCKRELL. Just let us make that one motion, Brother DAWES.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. GROOME. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 21, nays 22; as follows:

YEAS—21.

Brown,	George,	Jackson,	Ransom,

So the motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee to indefinitely postpone the resolution.

Mr. GROOME, (at two o'clock and twenty-six minutes p. m.) Mr. President, the Senate having just decided that it will not proceed to the consideration of executive business, and it being equally apparent that it will not just now proceed to the consideration of any other business, I move that it take a recess until five o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is moved by the Senator from Maryland that the Senate take a recess until five o'clock.

Mr. DAWES. That is debatable, I believe.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair does not so understand. It is not a debatable motion, the Chair thinks.

Mr. DAWES. I understand that it is; but nevertheless the Senator will perhaps permit me to inquire what the particular object of that motion is?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. By unanimous consent debate may be permitted.

Mr. GROOME. The object is to give the members of the Senate a chance to hold an informal conference and see if there is any basis on which they can get at an understanding by which they will proceed to the consideration of executive business, which is so very necessary to be transacted.

Mr. DAWES. If the Senators on the other side are in doubt as to their duty, I should be very happy to concede them an opportunity to confer and see if they would not come to their right mind; but if the Senator desires it for any other purpose, I assure him it is altogether useless.

Mr. GROOME. The Senators on this side of the Chamber are not in the least in doubt as to their duty. They feel it to be their duty to proceed to the consideration of executive business for which this session was convened. There have, however, been some intimations in the newspapers that the Senators on the other side of the Chamber or some of them are doubtful as to their duty; and in order to give us an opportunity by informal conference to verify those statements if they are correct, or to ascertain that they are incorrect, I have made this motion for a recess in the hope that some good may come of it.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, the Senator's kindness seems to be altogether unnecessary. I supposed that the motion arose from some desire on the other side to see if they could agree upon some policy more consistent with their duty to the Senate itself; but if it does not arise from that and the Senator tries to justify this course by any intimation that he does it for any purpose of giving this side an opportunity for a conference, I hope the Senator will withdraw his motion and address himself to the pending business.

Mr. GROOME. The Senators on this side of the Chamber need no lectures and no intimations as to what is their duty in the premises. As to the question of duty, they feel themselves fully competent to decide for themselves upon their own responsibility to the country. They will not assume to say to the other side what is the duty of that other side; they leave the Senators on the other side to decide that question for themselves with like responsibilities to the country if they decide it erroneously. But speaking for myself and speaking for the democratic Senators, having been called here by the President of the United States for the consideration of executive business, we stand ready now, as we have stood ready for weeks past, not only ready but anxious to proceed to the consideration of the business for which the session was convened, and I may say determined that we will give no other business whatever precedence over that business for which the session was called.

Mr. DAWES. With the same indulgence which the Senate has given the Senator from Maryland, I desire to say to the Senator that when he serves notice that he will suffer no other business to go on he undertakes to set himself up against the Senate, not against any particular party in the Senate, but against the Senate of the United States. The Senate of the United States have decided what business they will take up, and that was always supposed till now to be within the authority of the Senate itself. The Senate has been convened, and when convened it has been always supposed till now that the Senate could determine what particular business it would take up first. But now it appears that the Senator from Maryland has some authority to dictate to the Senate what it shall take up first. While I admit that the Senator from Maryland enjoys the confidence of Senators around him and the personal confidence, I am happy to say, of all Senators, yet the Senator assumes a constitutional power that I have not been able to find myself, and that is that any portion of the Senate of the United States can dictate to the Senate itself what the Senate itself shall do. I may be mistaken about that, but it has never occurred to me that any individual Senator had that authority.

I had supposed that under the economy of this Government the Senate itself when legally organized could determine for itself the order of its business. I may be mistaken, sir. I introduced this resolution under that impression; but if the Senator from Maryland—I speak in all friendly kindness, I know that personally we are willing to accord to him as much authority as to any other Senator upon this floor—if the Senator has any particular constitutional authority to say to the Senate of the United States "there are certain things the Senate shall not do," the Senator will do a great service to the country by disclosing his credentials.

Mr. GROOME. Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts has attempted to put language into my mouth which I did not use. I did not say, nor is my language capable of the construction, that this side intended to dictate to the other side what business this Senate should do. What I did say was that this side were the best judges of what course they would pursue, and that they proposed, one and all, to vote to give that public business for which this session was convened priority over all other business, and that they did not intend to vote that any other business should be taken up until the executive business for which this session was called was completed.

It is fashionable upon the other side of this Chamber to talk about "the Senate." This Senate is composed of seventy-six members. To-day, and upon frequent days in the past, we have seen twenty-one or twenty-two Senators voting in favor of a particular course of action, voting in favor of disregarding the recommendations of the President, voting in favor of clogging the wheels of government, voting in favor of subordinating the great public interests of this country to the miserable, little, petty, paltry interest of turning out a few officers who occupy places about the Senate; and then we see those twenty-one or twenty-two Senators claiming to be "the Senate of the United States." Now, sir, we deny once for all that claim. We say that nothing less than thirty-nine Senators upon this floor, a legitimate quorum of this body, can properly claim to be the Senate, and by all fair rules those that do not vote for a certain course are not to be classed as in favor of that course, certainly not unless by their pairs they indicate that they are. So that the twenty-one or twenty-two Senators who vote constantly to clog the hands of the Federal Administration, who vote constantly to defeat the will of the President of the United States by refusing to allow the executive business to be transacted for which this session was convened, are in no fair sense the Senate of the United States. If they were the Senate, they would make effective their action by carrying the vote of the Senate, which they have failed to do.

They twit us with the fact that on repeated instances the motion to go into executive session has failed. I remind them of the fact that in every instance in which they have attempted to procure a vote to go into the election of officers of the Senate they have failed. So that if the Senate has declared its intention not to transact executive business, it has declared its intention with equal emphasis not to allow the election of these officers.

For five weeks to-day this contest has gone on. During those five weeks not one moment's progress has been made in the public business. Those five weeks have been worse than wasted. The people of this land from one end to the other are clamorous that important appointments to offices which are now vacant, and for which nominations are lying upon our desk, shall be acted upon, and that those nominated shall either be confirmed or be rejected, and other nominations then sent in in their stead.

I say the people are tired of this condition of affairs. They are demanding action on the part of this body, and the democratic Senators stand ready to-day, as they have stood ready at all times of this session, to do that action if the opportunity be afforded to them. No blame, therefore, before the American people can rest upon them for the fact that no executive business has been done. They are not of the President's party, it is true, but in this contest from its beginning until now they have proved themselves the President's friends, for they have been unwilling to adopt any course of action which tended to bring the President into disrespect, which tended to break down his administration in its earliest days, and which tends, if kept up much longer, to make him the laughing-stock of the American people, for the reason that he cannot command the support of his own party friends to have his nominations acted upon either the one way or the other.

It was the fact made apparent by the votes of this Senate that if we sat here from now till five o'clock nothing would be done that, among other reasons, led me to move this recess until five o'clock. I would gladly withdraw the motion if I could have any assurance from my friend from Massachusetts that he would move in its stead to go into executive session and that any Senators on that side would vote to sustain the motion.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, the Senator from Maryland has fallen into two errors. One is that when a majority of the Senate, as it has almost every day for five weeks, an actual majority of the Senate has decided against him, he speaks of this side of the Chamber. The Senate does not know any "this side of the Chamber." When a majority of the Senate has declared its will it does not depend upon whether it comes from one side of the Chamber or the other. Has the Senator any authority for saying that a majority of one, declared at the Clerk's desk, is any less authoritative than a majority of twenty? Has the Senator any more right to say that "our side," speaking for himself, and "your side of the Senate" have taken different views when it is a majority of the Senate that has declared almost every day on different votes—not always but almost every day a majority of the Senate have decided that they will take up this resolution and act upon this before they will go into executive session, and before they will postpone this resolution till December, and before they will postpone it to any other day, and before they will lay it on the table? And yet the Senator from Maryland has some notion, derived from some authority found in the Constitution, I suppose—because he would not violate the Constitution he has sworn to support—that he is authorized to say to this Senate, "You shall not do this particular thing."

He thinks it is a small thing, but the majority of the Senate differ with him. He thinks he is defending the President, but a majority of the Senate differ with him. He thinks that for once the democratic party of this country is saving the republican President from being a laughing-stock; but the Senate itself differs with him; the Senate itself has declared that its view of defending the authority of the President of the United States as well as that of the Senate itself is to bow to the will of the majority. If it is necessary to preserve any President from being a laughing-stock, to say that a minority shall dictate to a majority in a government of majorities, perhaps the Senator is authorized to say that; he and those who act with him are standing in that position. That is one mistake he has fallen into.

The other mistake is this: When he states to the Senate and the country that the Senate has decided over and over again against this resolution, I tell him he is mistaken again. The Senate has not been permitted to decide at all upon the resolution. Those who think that their duty in a government of majorities is to resist the majority have prevented the Senate from acting upon the resolution.

Now, I will make a fair proposition to my distinguished friend from Maryland, if he speaks for his party, as I have no doubt he does, for he ought to have been permitted to speak for it long since. If he speaks for his party when he thinks that the Senate have decided against this resolution I will make this fair proposition to him, to let that question be decided to-day, at this moment; and if the Senate decide against the resolution not one word of murmur will be heard from the friends of the resolution. The friends of the resolution are its friends because they believe that the Senate is its friend. The opposition to the resolution is because those who oppose it know no other way to oppose the Senate itself but by using the instrumentalities of the Constitution designed to protect minorities for the purpose of defeating the will of the majority.

Now, having corrected these two mistakes which the Senator inadvertently fell into—because the Senator never would designedly undertake to mislead the Senate—I thank the Senate for indulging me in these remarks, and will interpose no further delay to taking a vote upon the resolution itself.

Mr. GROOME. Mr. President, I simply want to say——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Debate can proceed only by unanimous consent. Of course the Chair will not arrest it so long as the Senate sees proper to indulge it. The motion, as the Chair stated in the beginning, is not debatable. The Senator from Maryland.

Mr. GROOME. Mr. President——

Mr. HOAR. I ask unanimous consent for the Senator from Maryland to proceed with his remarks, and——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will not arrest debate so long as the Senate sees proper to indulge it. The Chair simply reminds Senators of the rule.

Mr. HOAR. The Chair did not hear my request for unanimous consent. I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Maryland may proceed with his remarks, and that at their conclusion the Senate vote on the resolution. If the Chair will make that request, I shall be obliged to him.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent of the Senate that the Senator from Maryland shall proceed with his remarks and at the conclusion of his remarks that the Senate vote upon his resolution. Is there objection? ["Yes," "Yes."]

Mr. GROOME. I thank the Senator from Massachusetts for that modest request. I shall not detain the Senate longer. I know the pending motion is not debatable.

Mr. HOAR. Was there objection to my request?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There were several objections. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Maryland, that the Senate take a recess until five o'clock this evening. [Putting the question.] The Chair is in doubt.

A division being had the ayes were 16 and the noes 19.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. No quorum voting.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is no quorum voting.

Several SENATORS. Call the Senate.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am very sure the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] is very much exhausted and wearied over his labors of to-day; and as there is no quorum we can only do one of two things, either have a call of the Senate or adjourn until to-morrow, and I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. DAWES. I hope we shall not do that. I do not want to come here to-morrow to repeat what we have done to-day.

Mr. CONKLING. Let us have the yeas and nays on the motion on which we took the vote by a division.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senator from Massachusetts must be almost completely exhausted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York demands the yeas and nays on the question upon which the Senate was dividing and found itself without a quorum. Is there a second? [Putting the question.] A sufficient number rising, the yeas and nays are ordered.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I believe that can only be done by unanimous consent when the vote has been declared.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will inform the Senator from West Virginia that the vote had not been formally announced. The Chair had announced that the ayes were so many and the noes so many; but the final announcement——

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. And no quorum voting.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That fact was announced.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Then is not the rule invariable that the roll of Senators shall be called?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The practice of the Senate has been exactly the other way, to allow the yeas and nays to be demanded as one of the methods of testing the question as to whether a quorum was present or not.

Mr. DAWES. I hope the Senator from Missouri will withdraw his motion, and let the roll be called.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the opinion of the Chair the demand for the yeas and nays was in order at the time it was made on the motion of the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. DAWES. I have no doubt the Chair is right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has so held, and there has been no appeal.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. There will not be any.

Mr. DAWES. I have no doubt the Chair is correct.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Then the yeas and nays will be taken on the motion of the Senator from Maryland, that the Senate now take a recess until five o'clock this evening.

Mr. COCKRELL. Does that have precedence over a motion to adjourn?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A motion to adjourn would take precedence of that motion.

Mr. DAWES. So I understood, and I understood the Senator from Missouri had made that motion, but I was making an appeal to the good sense and patriotism of the Senator from Missouri that he would submit to the requirements of the Constitution, and withdraw that motion.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, I rise to a question of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York will state his question of order.

Mr. CONKLING. It is of no consequence in this particular case; but it is of gravity that we preserve the usages of the Senate in all cases. I submit to the Chair that no Senator is entitled to a motion to adjourn when the Senate is dividing, because the Senate is then executing an order of its own. A vote by a division disclosed, as was thought, the absence of a quorum. I demanded in season the yeas and nays upon that question, that division; and I submit to the Chair that no Senator, pending that, can submit a motion to adjourn, or any motion whatever. It is in that regard like the attempt to interpose a motion during a roll-call of the Senate, which cannot be. The call must be completed because the Senate is executing an order of its own. So if on a vote viva voce the Chair is in doubt and the yeas and nays are demanded, pending that call no Senator can move that the Senate adjourn. He must wait until that order—it is more than business, it is an order of the Senate—is executed. The Senate is dividing, and until it divides no motion, I submit, is in order.

Mr. COCKRELL. There is no question about the correctness of the position of the Senator from New York. Now the motion for a recess is pending; the yeas and nays have been ordered upon it; and now I move that the Senate do adjourn.

Mr. CONKLING. After the yeas and nays are ordered?

Mr. COCKRELL. After the yeas and nays are ordered.

Mr. CONKLING. I am not sure that the Senator cannot do that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is of opinion that the motion of the Senator from Missouri is in order. While the Chair would be bound to sustain the question of order raised by the Senator from New York, the yeas and nays having been ordered upon the motion to take a recess and the roll-call not having commenced, the motion to adjourn may be interposed. The question, therefore, that the Chair will put is on the motion of the Senator from Missouri, that the Senate do now adjourn. The question is on that motion. [Putting the question.] The noes appear to have it.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SLATER, (when his name was called.) On this vote I am paired with the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. PLATT.]

Mr. WALKER, (when his name was called.) I am paired for the rest of the day with the Senator from Colorado, [Mr. HILL.]

The roll-call was concluded and the result announced—yeas 22, nays 23; as follows:

YEAS—22.

Beck,	Farley,	Hill of Georgia,	Pugh,
Brown,	George,	Jackson,	Ransom,
Call,	Gorman,	Jonas,	Vance,
Camden,	Groome,	Jones of Florida,	Voorhees.
Coke,	Hampton,	Morgan,
Davis of W. Va.,	Harris,	Pendleton,

NAYS—23.

Allison,	Dawes,	Ingalls,	Miller,
Anthony,	Edgerton,	Kellogg,	Morrill,
Burnside,	Hale,	Logan,	Platt of N. Y.,
Cameron of Wis.,	Harrison,	McDill,	Rollins,
Conger,	Hawley,	McMillan,	Sawyer.
Conkling,	Hoar,	Mahone,

ABSENT—31.

Bayard,	Ferry,	McPherson,	Sherman,
Blair,	Frye,	Maxey,	Slater,

Cockrell.	Hill of Colorado,	Plumb,	Vest,
Davis of Illinois,	Johnston,	Saulsbury,	Walker,
Edmunds,	Jones of Nevada,	Saunders,	Williams.
Fair,	Lamar,	Sewell,

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. GROOME,] that the Senate now take a recess until five o'clock, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move to amend that motion by making the hour six o'clock instead of five.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio moves to amend the motion by striking out "five" and inserting "six."

Mr. DAWES. May I inquire of the Senator what particular advantage that will be?

Mr. PENDLETON. The evening will be cooler if we begin at six instead of five.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator appeals——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is not debatable, and debate can only proceed by unanimous consent.

Mr. FARLEY. I believe I shall object to debate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio to amend the motion of the Senator from Maryland by striking out "five" and inserting "six." [Putting the question.] The ayes appear to have it.

Mr. ROLLINS called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll, but was interrupted by Mr. DAWES. The Senator from Maryland intimates that he will accept the amendment.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. That is a mistake.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The roll-call will continue. The Senator from Maryland cannot accept the amendment at this stage of the proceedings.

The Secretary concluded the roll-call, and the result was announced—yeas 21, nays 22; as follows:

YEAS—21.

Beck,	Farley,	Hill of Georgia,	Ransom,

So the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Maryland to take a recess until five o'clock, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BECK, (when his name was called.) I am paired for the rest of the day with the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HALE.]

Mr. KELLOGG, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DAVIS] upon all motions to go into executive business. This I understand is not such a motion, and therefore I vote "nay."

Mr. MORRILL, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] for half an hour.

Mr. SHERMAN, (when his name was called.) I desire to state once more that I am paired for the rest of the day with the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. LAMAR.]

Mr. SLATER, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. PLATT.]

The roll-call was concluded and the result announced—yeas 19, nays 20; as follows:

So the motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee to indefinitely postpone the pending resolution, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is moved by the Senator from Ohio that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. [Putting the question.] The Chair is in doubt as to the result.

Mr. COKE. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken resulted—yeas 19, nays 19; as follows:

YEAS—19.

Brown,	Farley,	Harris,	Pendleton,

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No quorum has voted. The Clerk will call the roll of the Senate.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts, as there is no quorum, had we not better adjourn?

Mr. DAWES. I would accede to any suggestion almost that the Senator from West Virginia would make, consistent with what I felt to be the duty of the Senate, but it does seem to me that the Senate should address itself to the pending business. Why should the Senate of the United States dispense with——

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Debate is out of order if the Senator wants to run on in that way. I addressed myself very respectfully to the Senator.

Mr. DAWES. I know, and I am addressing myself with great respect to the Senator from West Virginia.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Chair understand the Senator from West Virginia to object to the Senator from Massachusetts proceeding?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I think we had better have the roll called as there is no quorum voting.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is quite right, debate is out of order.

Mr. DAWES. That is quite extraordinary on the part of the Senator, he having addressed himself to me and objecting to my reply. I must qualify the remark I made a moment ago; and I must certainly say that I think there are Senators who would not do that thing.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. My friend on the left [Mr. BECK] suggests that I had better let the Senator from Massachusetts say what he has to say, that he will feel better.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from West Virginia withdraw his objection?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Certainly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would no more tolerate debate from the Senator from West Virginia than from the Senator from Massachusetts if objection were made.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I withdraw the objection, and shall be glad to hear the Senator from Massachusetts.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The objection is withdrawn, and the Senator from Massachusetts has the floor.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, I have nothing further to say.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Clerk will call the roll, there having been no quorum voting on the last roll-call.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Allison,	Dawes,	Ingalls,	Platt of Conn.,
Anthony,	Edgerton,	Jackson,	Platt of N. Y.,
Beck,	Farley,	Jonas,	Plumb,
Blair,	Ferry,	Jones of Florida,	Pugh,
Brown,	George,	Kellogg,	Ransom,
Burnside,	Gorman,	Logan,	Rollins,
Call,	Groome,	McDill,	Saunders,
Camden,	Hampton,	McMillan,	Sawyer,
Cameron of Wis.,	Harris,	Mahone,	Sewell,
Cockrell,	Harrison,	Miller,	Sherman,
Coke,	Hawley,	Mitchell,	Vance.
Conger,	Hill of Colorado,	Morgan,
Conkling,	Hill of Georgia,	Morrill,
Davis of W. Va.,	Hoar,	Pendleton,

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The roll-call shows the presence of fifty-three Senators. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. PENDLETON,] that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business, upon which motion the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BECK, (when his name was called.) I answered on the roll-call, but I am paired on all questions with the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HALE.]

Mr. MORRILL, (when his name was called.) On this vote I am paired with the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. VOORHEES.]

Mr. FERRY, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. SAULSBURY.] Were he here I should vote "nay."

Mr. KELLOGG, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DAVIS] on motions to proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 20, nays 21; as follows:

YEAS—20.

Brown,	Farley,	Harris,	Pendleton,
Call,	George,	Hill of Georgia,	Pugh,
Camden,	Gorman,	Jackson,	Ransom,
Coke,	Groome,	Jonas,	Slater,
Davis of W. Va.,	Hampton,	Morgan,	Vance.

NAYS—21.

Allison,	Dawes,	Logan,	Platt of N. Y.,
Anthony,	Edgerton,	McDill,	Rollins,
Burnside,	Harrison,	McMillan,	Sawyer.
Cameron of Wis.,	Hawley,	Mahone,
Conger,	Hoar,	Miller,
Conkling,	Ingalls,	Platt of Conn.,

ABSENT—35.

Bayard,	Ferry,	Kellogg,	Sewell,

Blair,	Garland,	McPherson,	Teller,
Butler,	Grover,	Maxey,	Van Wyck
Cameron of Pa.,	Hale,	Mitchell,	Vest,
Cockrell,	Hill of Colorado,	Morrill,	Voorhees,
Davis of Illinois,	Johnston,	Plumb,	Walker,
Edmunds,	Jones of Florida,	Saulsbury,	Williams.
Fair,	Jones of Nevada,	Saunders,

So the Senate refused to proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee to indefinitely postpone the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts, upon which motion the yeas and nays were ordered some days ago. Is the Senate ready for the question?

Mr. DAWES. It is I know but repetition to say what I feel I ought to say. The Senate has just decided by a majority—a majority repeated over and over again to-day—that any motion made to thwart the declared will of that majority of the Senate itself to proceed to the consideration of this resolution shall not prevail. Although the Senator who made this motion is now in the chair, and cannot very easily respond to what I say except by withdrawing the motion, I do not appeal to him with despair. I trust that the Senate will not be compelled by the minority of the Senate to continue this unseemly struggle to thwart the Senate itself. I wish the Senate would save me the trouble of repeating these remarks.

Those who continue this proceeding will understand, as I am quite sure they must understand, that it is not a proceeding that commends the Senate of the United States to public confidence. It all arises from an unwillingness to submit to the Senate itself. It is bringing this dignified body into reproach before the people. If those who have brought that reproach upon it can but see that it arises solely from an unwillingness to let the Senate control itself, I am quite sure there is not one upon whom this responsibility rests who would not make haste to throw it from his shoulders.

Therefore may I appeal to the mover of this motion, which has been decided by a majority of the Senate over and over again, not to persist in asking the Senate itself to surrender its right to control its own business to those who have no other objection to its exercising that right than that they are not pleased with what the Senate itself proposes to do? That is a thing that arises always with a minority in any body. If there is a minority at all in any body it exists because they are not pleased with what the body itself has determined to do. That makes no exception; it takes this case in no respect out of the ordinary case of those who are not pleased with what the Senate itself proposes to do, and therefore seek to justify themselves before the country by declaring that the Senate shall not do it because they are not pleased with what the Senate proposes to do. You might just as well say that as those who turned up in the minority at the last presidential election were not pleased by any means with what the country did, why should they submit to what the country determined it would do, any more than the minority here should submit now to what the Senate does? The Senate is to those who are resisting it what the judgment of the nation in last November was to those who differed with them. In principle it is nothing else.

I appeal confidently to the Senator who made this motion that he will withdraw it, and let us proceed to the consideration of the resolution.

Mr. BECK. The trouble with the Senator from Massachusetts is that he will not believe what we tell him. We have told him over and over again—I have, at least, and some others—that having an equal number of Senators with the gentleman's side of the Chamber we do not intend to allow him to refuse to transact the public business for which we were called together in order to take up any outside matter that his caucus has ordered him to take up. Having repeated that over and over again, why will it not be well, since he cannot do just what he would like to do, to do the next best thing and proceed to the consideration of the public business? I know it is very hard to convince a gentleman who is the representative of a great caucus that he is not omnipotent; but I think after a month's struggle he has come to the conclusion that he is going to progress very slowly if he persists in the course he is now taking.

Mr. DAWES. Yes, but surely.

Mr. BECK. Very surely to do nothing in that direction. The country has got to understand that it makes no sort of difference to them whether the present officers remain where they are or whether new ones are put in, so that they are not afraid of that sort of revolution about which we have heard so much—a revolution that simply lets things alone. I never before heard of a revolution that let things alone; I never heard of treason that was guilty of no other act but just to let things alone. If the Army were in the field and we were refusing supplies, or if any great public necessity demanded the appropriation of money, then if we sat in our seats the country might tell us that we were guilty of a great wrong; or if we were refusing to transact the public business for which the President called us together, then there might be some great wrong; or if we would not consider the treaties that are now pressing upon us, upon which the gentlemen on the other side are revolutionizing by refusing to look at them, then we might be guilty of something; but I cannot see how we can be guilty of any great wrong before the country simply in saying "Go on with the business; we have given you the committees; we have given you the clerks; we have given you the organization; you have the men; the traditions of the country have all been in favor of allowing the officers to stay through executive sessions;" and because you want to show us that you are going to make us do just whatever you want, whether we like it or not, and then scold, as you were doing a little while ago, why should we surrender the legitimate business for which we were called together? I assure you, in all earnestness, that we might as well take up executive business now as to do it a week hence. The weather is getting hot and it will be unpleasant after a while. Therefore I move to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. DAWES. Will not the Senator withdraw the motion for a moment?

Mr. BECK. Certainly, if the Senator will renew it, or allow me to renew it.

Mr. DAWES. I will allow you.

Mr. BECK. That would be more graceful; I would rather do it.

Mr. DAWES. I would a great deal rather that the Senator would do it than to do it myself, because I do not think it would be patriotic to do it. Although I should regret to see the Senator do an unpatriotic act, I should rather he should do it than to do it myself.

The Senator says the difficulty with me is, there is not a majority, and as they have an equal number of votes with those who are in favor of this resolution that is a good reason why the resolution should not pass. Did the Senator hear the announcement of the last vote? Did the Senator hear over and over again that there is an actual majority of the count against him? Does not the Senator know that one of his thirty-eight, giving to his country and to mankind what the Senator from Kentucky thought belonged to his party, has declared in the Senate that he will throw no obstacles in the way of accomplishing what the pending resolution proposes? Having said that, he has turned his back upon the proceedings on the other side, and much as his counsel and his vote might have aided our friends on the other side they have been without it ever since this proceeding has been pending here.

Why, then, does the Senator get up and say that they having thirty-eight and we only thirty-eight we have no right to say that we are the Senate? The Senator has not thirty-eight on this question. If the Senator thought we are no more the Senate than they are, if he really thought so, he would let us have a vote here, as I have told him over and over again that we would never utter a murmur if we failed. The resolution would be as effectually killed with thirty-eight to thirty-eight and no more as it would without any other majority.

The Senator cannot be sincere, I think, (though I never knew him at any other time but what he was sincere,) in repeating here over and over again his statement that we are not the Senate. If we are not the Senate we cannot pass the resolution, and there is no occasion for throwing any obstacle in the way. We could dispose of it finally, put it to an everlasting sleep, and go into executive session and transact all the business before five o'clock and adjourn at six; but it is because the Senator knows the Senate is not with him that he is not willing to conclude the entire public business before six o'clock this night.

The Senator is in a delusion; it may be a happy delusion for the present time, but it is no less a delusion; and all the force which he has called up to his assistance, still a minority, does not make it less a delusion. It does not answer, nobody has answered for the last six weeks, the question I now repeat for the hundredth time, if it is not the Senate behind this resolution what objection is there to taking a vote and settling that question?

Mr. BECK. If the Senator from Massachusetts only happened to be on our side of this question and was seeking to press us into executive session, and into the consideration of treaties, as we have been pressing him, and if we had constantly refused to consider the executive business for which the President had called us together or to consider the treaties for which we had been brought here and had insisted upon turning out the Secretary and the Sergeant-at-Arms and had held on for four or five weeks to do that trivial thing to the exclusion of all other business, can he imagine what a speech he could have made on our side? I know what he would have said; I know how well he would have put it, and how the country would have responded to it. I think he ought to understand that when he is now preventing the thing which he would have denounced so, (and his "revolution" and "treason" would have been mild words then,) and in order to give him time to reflect—I was about to say on the folly of the position he is now holding—I renew the motion to lay the resolution on the table. I hope he will vote for the motion, and bring the resolution up hereafter, when the executive business is over, if he likes to keep up this wrangle in hot weather.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Kentucky, that the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts lie upon the table. [Putting the question.] The Chair is in doubt as to the result. Senators voting for the motion will rise and stand until counted.

There were on a division—ayes 20, noes 20.

Mr. ROLLINS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FERRY, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. SAULSBURY.] Were he here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. JONES, of Nevada, (when his name was called.) I am paired with my colleague, [Mr. FAIR.] If he were here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. MORRILL, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. VOORHEES.]

Mr. SAWYER, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from West Virginia, [Mr. CAMDEN.]

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. BLAIR. I am paired with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. JOHNSTON] with the right to vote to make a quorum. If necessary, I desire to vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Clerk informs the Chair that a quorum has voted.

The result was announced—yeas 20, nays 20; as follows:

YEAS—20.

Brown,	George,	Hill of Georgia,	Pendleton,
Call,	Gorman,	Jackson,	Pugh,
Coke,	Groome,	Jonas,	Ransom,
Davis of W. Va.,	Hampton,	Jones of Florida,	Slater,
Farley,	Harris,	Morgan,	Vance.

NAYS—20.

Allison,	Conkling,	Hoar,	Mahone,
Anthony,	Dawes,	Ingalls,	Miller,
Burnside,	Edgerton,	Logan,	Platt of Conn.,
Cameron of Wis.,	Harrison,	McDill,	Platt of N. Y.,
Conger,	Hawley,	McMillan,	Rollins.

ABSENT—36.

Bayard,	Fair,	Kellogg,	Sawyer,
Beck,	Ferry,	Lamar,	Sewell,
Blair,	Frye,	McPherson,	Sherman,
Butler,	Garland,	Maxey,	Teller,
Camden,	Grover	Mitchell,	Van Wyck,
Cameron of Pa.,	Hale,	Morrill,	Vest,
Cockrell,	Hill of Colorado,	Plumb,	Voorhees.
Davis of Illinois,	Johnston,	Saulsbury,	Walker,
Edmunds,	Jones of Nevada,	Saunders,	Williams.

So the motion to lay the resolution on the table was not agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee to postpone indefinitely the resolution, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. I think that is what we came here for and what we ought to do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from West Virginia, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. DAWES. I am willing that the Senator from West Virginia should take the sense of the Senate upon that question, if the Senator has any doubt about the sense of the Senate on it.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary called the roll.

Mr. SAWYER. I understand there is not a quorum and I vote "nay." If there is a quorum I do not vote.

Mr. FERRY. Is there less than a quorum?

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. COCKRELL in the chair.) A quorum has voted. The yeas are 22 and the nays are 21. The motion prevails.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The motion was to go into executive session.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That was the motion.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Then the galleries must be cleared and the doors closed.

Mr. LAMAR. I am paired with the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN.] I see he is not present, and I wish to withdraw my vote.

Mr. HARRIS. In view of that fact, I move to reconsider the vote by which the motion was carried. The Senator from Mississippi wishes to withdraw his vote.

Mr. CONKLING. Can that not be done by unanimous consent?

Mr. LAMAR. I ask unanimous consent.

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator from Mississippi asks unanimous consent, and if that is granted his vote may be withdrawn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi asks unanimous consent to withdraw his vote. Is there objection? The Chair hears no objection; and the Chair will announce the result of the vote upon the motion of the Senator from West Virginia.

The result was announced—yeas 21, nays 21; as follows:

YEAS—21.

Brown,	Gorman,	Jonas,	Slater,
Call,	Groome,	Jones of Florida,	Vance,
Coke,	Hampton,	Morgan,	Voorhees.
Davis of W. Va.,	Harris,	Pendleton,
Farley,	Hill of Georgia,	Pugh,
George,	Jackson,	Ransom,

NAYS—21.

Allison,	Dawes,	Logan,	Platt of Conn.,
Anthony,	Edgerton,	McDill,	Platt of N. Y.,
Burnside,	Harrison,	McMillan,	Rollins.
Cameron of Wis.,	Hawley,	Mahone,
Conger,	Hoar,	Miller,
Conkling,	Ingalls,	Morrill,

ABSENT—34.

Bayard,	Fair,	Kellogg,	Sewell,
Beck,	Ferry,	Lamar,	Sherman,
Blair,	Frye,	McPherson,	Teller,
Butler,	Garland,	Maxey,	Van Wyck,
Camden,	Grover,	Mitchell,	Vest,
Cameron of Pa.,	Hale,	Plumb,	Walker,
Cockrell,	Hill of Colorado,	Saulsbury,	Williams.
Davis of Illinois,	Johnston,	Saunders,
Edmunds,	Jones of Nevada,	Sawyer,

So the motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee to postpone the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts indefinitely.

Mr. HARRIS. It now lacks two minutes of four o'clock. I am satisfied that my friend from Massachusetts is fatigued with the labors of to-day, in view of which fact I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. DAWES. If the Senator is prompted by any such consideration I beg to assure the Senator that I am not so fatigued as to make it necessary for him to make that motion.

Mr. HARRIS. I know the modesty of my friend from Massachusetts, who disclaims any sense of fatigue; but as the motion is not debatable I do not propose that either he or I shall debate it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is not debatable, and the Chair will put the question to the Senate. [Putting the question.] By the sound the ayes appear to have it.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask for a division.

Mr. ROLLINS. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. KELLOGG, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DAVIS] upon motions to go into executive session, but not upon any other motion. Therefore I vote "nay" upon the motion to adjourn.

Mr. LAMAR, (when his name was called.) I am paired temporarily with the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN.]

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 21, nays 22; as follows:

YEAS—21.

Brown,	Gorman,	Jonas,	Slater,
Call,	Groome,	Jones of Florida,	Vance,
Coke,	Hampton,	Morgan,	Voorhees.
Davis of W. Va.,	Harris,	Pendleton,

George,	Jackson,	Ransom,

NAYS—22.

Allison,	Dawes,	Kellogg,	Morrill,
Anthony,	Edgerton,	Logan,	Platt of Conn.,
Burnside,	Harrison,	McDill,	Platt of N. Y.,
Cameron of Wis.,	Hawley,	McMillan,	Rollins.
Conger,	Hoar,	Mahone,
Conkling,	Ingalls,	Miller,

ABSENT—33.

Bayard,	Fair,	Lamar,	Sherman,
Beck,	Ferry,	McPherson,	Teller,
Blair,	Frye,	Maxey,	Van Wyck,

Cameron of Pa.,	Hale,	Saulsbury,	Williams.
Cockrell,	Hill of Colorado,	Saunders,
Davis of Illinois,	Johnston,	Sawyer,
Edmunds,	Jones of Nevada,	Sewell,

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee moves that the Senate do now proceed to the consideration of executive business. [Putting the question.] The Chair is in doubt.

Mr. HARRIS and others called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 19, nays 20; as follows:

YEAS—19.

Brown,	Gorman,	Jackson,	Pugh,
Call,	Groome,	Jonas,	Ransom,
Coke,	Hampton,	Jones of Florida,	Vance,
Davis of W. Va.,	Harris,	Morgan,	Voorhees.
Farley,	Hill of Georgia,	Pendleton,

NAYS—20.

Allison,	Conkling,	Hoar,	Mahone,

Burnside,	Edgerton,	Logan,	Morrill,
Cameron of Wis.,	Harrison,	McDill,	Platt of N. Y.,
Conger,	Hawley,	McMillan,	Rollins.

ABSENT—37.

Bayard,	Ferry,	Lamar,	Sherman,

Davis of Illinois,	Johnston,	Saunders,
Edmunds,	Jones of Nevada,	Sawyer,
Fair,	Kellogg,	Sewell,

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. Mr. President, I move that when the Senate adjourns it adjourn to meet to-morrow at twelve o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio moves that when the Senate adjourns it adjourn to meet at twelve o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. HARRIS. I demand the yeas and nays on that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HARRIS. I move to amend by striking out "twelve" and inserting "one."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee moves to amend the motion of the Senator from Ohio by striking out "twelve" and inserting "one."

Mr. HARRIS. On that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, what is the motion?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion of the Senator from Ohio is that when the Senate adjourns it be to meet at twelve o'clock to-morrow. The Senator from Tennessee has moved an amendment to that by striking out "twelve" and inserting "one," and upon that the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. DAWES. I do not think that is in order, Mr. President. The other motion is simply a motion that we now adjourn; which it is not in order to amend. You cannot amend that motion, and this motion in another form is the same thing.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. What is the point of order of the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. DAWES. The motion of the Senator from Ohio that the Senate do now adjourn till twelve o'clock to-morrow is simply a motion to adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is not the motion of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. DAWES. I beg pardon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion of the Senator from Ohio is that when the Senate adjourns it be to meet at that time.

Mr. DAWES. That is the standing order of the Senate.

Mr. PENDLETON. It is in order notwithstanding.

Mr. DAWES. It is a standing order of the Senate, and therefore I construe this simply as a motion to adjourn; if it is not a motion to adjourn, it is not anything. Any motion that adjourns the Senate till to-morrow at twelve o'clock is a motion to adjourn, and that cannot be amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion of the Senator from Ohio is that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet at twelve o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Chair allow me to call his attention one moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. Certainly you cannot add to the number of motions which are privileged a motion to declare what the Senate has already ordered by its standing rule. There is an order of the Senate now in force that when the Senate adjourns it be to meet at twelve o'clock to-morrow. Now if it were true that that motion would be in order and you could make that over and over again, at any time after it had passed once it might be passed again. On the pending business it is of no sort of consequence now to the Chair, because, of course, these motions which are being made can be multiplied; but it may be of great consequence some time. The Senate has already ordered that when it adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at twelve o'clock to-morrow. That is the point, and therefore the motion cannot be renewed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion of the Senator from Ohio is that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet at twelve o'clock to-morrow. That is the standing order of the Senate unless otherwise ordered, and the Chair doubts very much whether the motion is in order.

Mr. PENDLETON. Will the Chair decide the question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will decide that that motion, being simply a repetition of the standing order of the Senate, would not be in order to adjourn to that particular hour, the same hour fixed in the regular standing order.

Mr. PENDLETON. I have no disposition to take an appeal from the decision of the Chair, but I am clearly of opinion that the motion is in order. However, I yield to the decision of the Chair without appeal, and move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet at eleven o'clock to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That motion is evidently in order. The Senator from Ohio moves that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet at eleven o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. HARRIS. I demand the yeas and nays on that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HARRIS. I propose to amend by making eleven o'clock and forty-five minutes the hour.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee moves to amend the motion of the Senator from Ohio by changing the hour of meeting to-morrow from "eleven" to "eleven forty-five."

Mr. HARRIS. I want the yeas and nays on that amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, I move to amend the amendment by inserting "one" o'clock to-morrow instead of "eleven forty-five," and ask for the yeas and nays on that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kentucky moves to amend by inserting one o'clock as the hour of meeting to-morrow, and asks for the yeas and nays on that amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky to the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee to the motion of the Senator from Ohio, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. GROOME, (at four o'clock and eighteen minutes p. m.) I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maryland moves that the Senate do now adjourn. [Putting the question.] The Chair is in doubt.

Mr. MCMILLAN called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maryland moves that the Senate do now adjourn, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. PLATT, of Connecticut, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Oregon, [Mr. SLATER.]

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 20, nays 22; as follows:

YEAS—20.

Edmunds,	Jones of Florida,	Saunders,

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky to the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee to the motion of the Senator from Ohio, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BECK, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HALE.]

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 21, nays 21; as follows:

YEAS—21.

Brown,	George,	Jackson,	Ransom,
Call,	Gorman,	Jonas,	Vance,
Camden,	Groome,	Jones of Florida,	Voorhees.

Edmunds,	Jones of Nevada,	Saunders,
Fair,	Lamar,	Sewell,

So the amendment to the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, I am greatly disappointed, I will not say discouraged, for I do not intend to be discouraged, but I am disappointed that our friends in the minority making war upon the Senate have continued it all day to-day. I hope they will come to a different conclusion to-morrow, and in that hope I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at four o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, April 27, 1881.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

WESTERN JUDICIAL DISTRICT OF VIRGINIA.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, I was not in my seat yesterday when the Chair laid before the Senate a letter of the Attorney-General, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate, copies of correspondence received from Warren S. Lurty, United States attorney for the western district of Virginia, in relation to the late report of C. C. Lancaster, special agent of the Treasury Department, and it was ordered to lie on the table. I move now that the report be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

ISTHMUS SHIP-CANALS.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask leave to submit a resolution, which I ask may be read for information.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That the interests of the people of the United States of America and the welfare and security of their Government are so involved in the subject of the construction of ship-canals and other ways for the transportation of sea-going vessels across the isthmus connecting North and South America, that the Government of the United States, with the frankness which is due to all other peoples and governments, hereby asserts that it will insist that its consent is a necessary condition precedent to the execution of any such project; and also as to the rules and regulations under which other nations shall participate in the use of such canals or other ways, either in peace or in war.

Mr. DAWES. I object to the resolution. I object not so much to the sentiment of the resolution as to the fact that it calls for concurrent action when there is no House of Representatives which can concur. It seems to me to be out of order. I do not speak in reference to the sentiment, but in reference to the fact that at this called session of the Senate a concurrent resolution asking for the action of the other branch as well as this, the other branch not being in existence, is hardly in order.

Mr. MORGAN. The other branch of Congress is in existence although it is not in session.

Mr. DAWES. No, not yet.

Mr. MORGAN. Its members hold their commissions to-day, and if the President saw proper to call them together, there would not have to be an election in order to secure a House of Representatives.

The precedents presented the other day by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] seem to have exhausted research upon this question and establish the fact beyond controversy that this body may engage in any measure that it sees proper to devote its attention to in a session called for executive business or any other business. We have seen, however, during the present session of the Senate that the Senate has taken up various matters which are not connected with an executive session. We have been for forty-odd days debating a measure which is not connected in the slightest degree with executive business, and that measure has been all the time antagonized by the Senator from Massachusetts against the consideration of executive business.

The Senator objects that the resolution is not in order, and makes his objection upon the ground that the other House is not in session. I understand that to be the drift of his objection. He having made that point upon the resolution, and no other, I think it my duty to say that this resolution is one of such great public importance that it requires and deserves the attention of the Senate at this session. Either the substance of the resolution is of no consequence at all to the American people and to the other commercial nations of the earth, or it requires some immediate action.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator will allow me a moment, without interrupting his remarks, to state that I think it would be entirely proper for him to ask the Senate to express its opinion; but he asks the Senate to express an opinion in concurrence with the House, not of itself. I do not recollect any precedent cited by the Senator from Indiana, in his elaborate research the other day, where the Senate undertook to do any business in concurrence with a House of Representatives not only not in session but not even qualified or having any legal existence. If the Senator makes this simply a resolution calling for the opinion of the Senate upon this important subject he will not find me objecting. My objection is to the form of the resolution. The very form that the Senator uses, if he gets a vote of the Senate, stops it right here. It cannot go forth as the opinion of the Senate until after the House meets in December and concurs in it. If, therefore, he desires to have the opinion of the Senate he must modify the resolution. That is the point.

Mr. MORGAN. The point the Senator from Massachusetts makes had not escaped my attention at all. I had observed the phraseology of the resolution, and adopted it because it is the same phraseology as that reported unanimously by the Committee on Foreign Relations at the last session of Congress, and which the Senate, I dare say, would have passed but for want of time to consider it; and I think it would also have passed the House of Representatives but for want of time.

But a precedent is not necessary always to establish a proposition either under the law or under the Constitution of the United States. The Senator from Massachusetts has doubtless observed that feature of the Constitution of the United States which authorizes the President to call either House in extraordinary session. For what purpose could the House of Representatives be called in extraordinary session except for some legislative object? What purpose could be accomplished by the House of Representatives if called alone in extraordinary session unless that purpose was to be consummated by concurrent action on the part of the Senate? The answer is a very clear one. It makes no difference what may be the purpose for which the President of the United States might call the House in a separate session; the House could accomplish nothing in such session without the concurrent or joint action of the Senate. Yet the House may be so assembled. The language of the Constitution is not that the House of Representatives may be assembled or that the Senate may be assembled, but that either House may be assembled; so that it must result that if the President of the United States chose to have certain measures put into a state of forwardness, a state of consideration upon which the other House could act when it came into session, either in regular session or in a called session of Congress, he would have the right to assemble that House under the Constitution and have it go to work upon the matters which fall peculiarly within its own jurisdiction or the matters which fall within the jurisdiction of the Congress of the United States. He might find it necessary to have a revision of the tariff; he might find it necessary to have a new tax law enacted. It might become absolutely incumbent upon the Executive as a part of his constitutional duty to have that branch of Congress assembled here for the purpose of considering tariff bills and internal-revenue bills, or, if you please, an appropriation bill, and have it in such a state of maturity that when he saw proper to call the other branch into joint session with it as a Congress of the United States, progress would have been made and the interest and the benefit of the country would have been materially advanced. So there is no difficulty, at least none that raises a point of order, in the objection that is made by the Senator from Massachusetts.

I introduced the resolution in this form with a view of having it referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, with the expectation that if that committee saw proper in reporting it back to consider that the Senate was in some peculiar session in which we could not obtain the concurrent or joint action of the other House, that committee in reporting back the resolution could so modify it as to make it a resolution of the Senate instead of its being a concurrent resolution. But considering for my part that the Senate of the United States has the right now to pass this as a concurrent resolution, and when the regular or any extraordinary session of Congress shall be convened to have this very subject-matter thus passed and carried to the House of Representatives there reported and there acted upon, believing that the Senate has that power, I introduced the resolution in its present form. I do not see proper to modify it merely to suit the views of the Senator from Massachusetts, when I know that if the Committee on Foreign Relations when it comes to consider the subject shall concur with him it will report the resolution back in such form as it may think proper for the action of the Senate; but certainly there is no question of order which lies against it now, either under the Constitution of the United States or under any rule of the Senate.

I was about to observe upon the merits of the resolution a word, which is this: If the resolution is of any importance at all, it is of sufficient importance now to require the attention of the Senate, because we are thoroughly informed that parties are progressing with the construction of a transcontinental ship-canal to connect the Pacific and Atlantic Oceans by such a way, without any regard to the opinions of the people of the United States, the Congress of the United States, or the President of the United States as expressed in his last and previous annual messages. If the Senate of the United States expects to take any action upon this subject, it is time that it was now being considered. It is very much better that the subject should be considered alone by the Senate, and that the opinion of the Senate, one of the branches of the great legislative department of this Government, should now be taken upon this subject, than that it should be left at loose ends, and perhaps the people of France, England, and other countries, particularly the persons connected with this canal project, be deceived into the belief that we do not expect to enforce any conditions connected with that great work in virtue of the sovereignty of the people of the United States and their intimate interest in this great question. They should not be misled by our nonaction. It is sufficient to put them on their guard in respect to our intentions and purposes, and it is on our part a delinquency, if we entertain the opinions that are expressed in the resolution, not to come forward, even the Senate alone, and let the world know the ground we intend to occupy upon this great subject.

I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I desire to submit to the honorable Senator from Alabama the attitude which his resolution, as he leaves it, presents. Supposing him to be entirely right in his position as to the question of order, and that at this session it is perfectly proper and appropriate to introduce legislation or a resolution requiring the concurrence of the other House, still there is another view of it. A concurrent resolution does not purport to be the final opinion of the Senate itself. It is the Senate undertaking to consult its co-ordinate body, the other branch of the Legislature, and the other branch of the Legislature has the same power that a committee of the Senate has, or that any individual Senator has, to propose amendments to what the Senate says, to make those amendments in order, and to require our action upon them; so that the Senator introduces a resolution in a form which says the Senate of the United States does not propose to declare its opinion upon this important subject now, but simply to consult a body which in the ordinary course of things will not be organized until next December, and after such consultation to require an expression of the joint opinion of the two bodies. Although, of course, the committee may modify the resolution, the Senator and the Senate, so far as it takes action by its reference, expresses a purpose or proposition that if another body agrees with it, it will take action on this subject next winter.

Without regard to the point of order suggested by my colleague, it seems to me to have the resolution go to the Committee on Foreign Relations in this shape as the expression of the opinion of a Senator so able and prominent as the honorable Senator from Alabama is on the Committee on Foreign Relations, will have, so far as it has any effect, an injurious effect. He says this morning, whatever he may say next week or next month when this comes back from the committee, "I do not propose to have anything said about this until next winter; I do not propose to have anything said about it by the Senate till it has heard and considered the opinion and suggestions of the House."

I have not considered the phraseology of the resolution; but as a friend to the opinion which I suppose, from hearing it casually, the Senator entertains, and in the most absolute good faith, without any regard to any question of difference between the two sides of the Chamber or any question of order, I suggest to the Senator whether it would not be well for him himself now before its reference to make it an expression of the opinion of the Senate. I suggest that with entire deference to him, and I have stated these reasons for his consideration.

Mr. MORGAN. I have heard it frequently intimated in the public prints that there is a possibility of a called session of Congress, which if convened should be very soon. Of course I am not in an attitude to know anything about that; but I have believed all the time (particularly as the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR] has introduced a resolution expressing the opinion of the Senate that it was the duty of the President to call Congress together in extraordinary session) that there might be, after all, a called session of Congress. I desired, therefore, to introduce the resolution and send it to the committee in such a shape as to meet that view of the case in the event there was such a called session. If the honorable Senator from Massachusetts will offer an amendment to the resolution striking out the concurrent words and making it a resolution of the Senate, and let both the resolution and the amendment go to the committee, I shall have no objection.

Mr. DAWES. What is the objection to the Senator modifying his own resolution?

Mr. MORGAN. There is no objection in the world to it, except——

Mr. DAWES. Let the Senator modify his own resolution. There will not be any objection to it then.

Mr. MORGAN. Except that I have been a good deal in hopes that the Senator from New Hampshire would succeed in his resolution and that we should have a called session of Congress. I desired, therefore, to be ready for it when it came.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator from New Hampshire followed the precedents and asked the Senate of the United States to express its opinion. The Senator from Alabama well says that delay would not be fit under the circumstances, and that being the case why not let the Senate express its opinion, and then take the opinion of the House when it is assembled?

Mr. MORGAN. For the purpose of obliging the Senator from Massachusetts, I will amend the resolution by striking out the words "by the Senate, the House of Representatives concurring," and will offer it in that form.

Mr. BLAIR. Will the Senator allow me one moment before he makes that modification of his resolution? I have no objection to the modification if the Senator sees fit to make it; but I do question the ground upon which the objection to the resolution as it now stands is based.

The junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] says that the resolution in its present form being a concurrent resolution, even if it passes the Senate, is no expression of the opinion of the Senate, because it is simply the action of the Senate in soliciting advice from the other branch of the legislative department of the Government. If that is true of this concurrent resolution, would it not be true in case the form of the resolution were joint or in case it were an ordinary bill introduced for action by the Senate? Upon what theory are any of these propositions for legislation introduced except as a means of obtaining the opinion of the other branch of the Legislature? We know that our rules prohibit even an allusion to what is passing at the other end of the Capitol while any proposition is pending in this. It seems to me, for us to say that action by the Senate in passing a concurrent resolution is not an expression of the judgment of the Senate is a very great absurdity. Unless the honorable Senator from Alabama is ready to concede the point that the consideration of any business whatever is out of order at this session except simply executive business; unless he is prepared to take that ground and to concede that what has been hitherto universally admitted on both sides, that the Senate being in session could consider whatever would be appropriate for the Senate alone to consider if the other House of Congress were in session; unless he is willing to place himself upon the ground that we have been in error hitherto, I trust that he will not modify his resolution. I do not see any reason why the resolution may not be considered as it now is.

It is possible, of course, that there will be an extra session of Congress; the matter would be just so much expedited by a concurrent resolution should there be such a session called. I am profoundly impressed with the belief that the public good requires such a session for almost innumerable reasons. I do not claim that I represent the opinion of any other Senator whatever in regard to the matter, or that the administration or any member of the administration does or does not concur with me in like sentiment; but I think there should be an extra session, and that this is one of the subjects which should be considered at such a session. I think if there is any Monroe doctrine it is time to assert it; if there is any power or any intent in the Government of the United States or among the people of the United States to assert the most distant connection with or interest in the construction of a canal across the Isthmus, it is time for us to manifest it in some tangible way.

What has happened in the past? Can anybody dignify the action of Congress with reference to it as anything more than mere legislative gossip thus far? What foreign nation is bound to take notice of the action of the Congress of the United States or the people of the United States with reference to the construction of that canal up to the present day? Yet a foreign corporation under the patronage of a foreign government is digging through the Isthmus to-day; and, as I observed the other morning, a vested right is being acquired; and, as the honorable Senator intimates, we are likely to be foreclosed, so far as the justice of our claim would be concerned, if we were to set up the right hereafter to even remonstrate.

Other great questions ought to be considered at a legislative session, and ought to be considered before next December. The attitude of parties toward each other at the present time is such that a great deal of valuable time is being utterly wasted, as it seems to me. We are not likely to recede from our positions relatively at present. I do not see at least any reason why we are likely to do so. Although it is very evident to me that the minority ought to recede, they judge differently. Why should we waste this time, and particularly if the minority assert the right to obstruct the action of the Senate interminably, assembled as it now is? If that right involves, as I think it does, the right to obstruct ordinary general legislation, why ought we not to test their design, and to test it immediately?

For that reason, as a republican, as one who belongs to the majority, as I claim it to be, on this floor at the present time, I should like to see that question tested. Between now and next December we could find out what attitude the minority is to occupy upon the exceedingly interesting question whether one man may thwart legislation interminably, if that is to be done. That is an important question of itself, and it ought to be decisive upon the matter of policy whether there should be an extra session of Congress called, and that forthwith. I do not suppose that that view of it will be very influential with my friends upon the other side, but it is with me.

At such a session there are many things important to be considered. More than half of the bills introduced into the Senate the last Congress failed to be considered at all, although referred to committees. More than half the important public business failed to be considered at all committees. I have some data upon that subject by which I propose to lay before the Senate in due time as bearing upon this general question.

But to get back to what is now before the Senate, and that is the question of the modification of the form of this concurrent resolution for the reasons assigned by the Senator from Massachusetts. I think I have said enough to indicate that the concession, if it is made as to an objection of principle, is sufficient to exclude the consideration of all business by the Senate at this called session except that which is of an executive character.

Mr. DAWES. Without discussing with the Senator from New Hampshire the interesting question he has raised about the desirability of an extra session of Congress, upon which I have a very decided opinion somewhat different from that of the Senator, if the Senator from Alabama will modify his resolution as suggested, I will withdraw my point of order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Alabama modify the resolution?

Mr. MORGAN. I will make the modification. Of course, that amounts to no committal of itself to any particular position upon the question whether the resolution should be concurrent or a simple resolution of the Senate.

Mr. DAWES. I only make the suggestion because of a firm conviction that otherwise the very purpose that the Senator seeks, I know in good faith, would be thwarted; there could no voice go forth of any force whatever. What potential force there can be in an expression of opinion by the Senate of the United States would be lost, because whatever may be the vote it would stop here to await the House. Without discussing the point of order, anxious as I am to co-operate with the Senator in serving notice of the kind he indicates, I wish the Senator to modify the resolution.

Mr. MORGAN. I will modify the resolution, and I ask its reference to the Committee on Foreign Relations, stating at the same time that I have no idea by offering the resolution in one form or the other that I can commit the Senate, or that the Senate would even by referring the resolution, if upon a call of the yeas and nays, commit itself in either form. I therefore modify the resolution and ask its reference to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. DAWES. I hope there will be no objection.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the resolution as modified.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the interests of the people of the United States of America and the welfare and security of their Government are so involved in the subject of the construction of ship-canals and other ways for the transportation of sea-going vessels across the isthmus connecting North and South America, that the Government of the United States, with the frankness which is due to all other peoples and governments, hereby asserts that it will insist that its consent is a necessary condition precedent to the execution of any such project; and also as to the rules and regulations under which other nations shall participate in the use of such canals or other ways, either in peace or in war.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, I have no objection to the modification of the resolution nor to the sentiments expressed therein; but I protest against the assumption that the resolution in its original form was not in order and that it was not competent for the Senate to adopt it. There is no difference between the Senate as now assembled and as assembled in any other capacity or on any other occasion. The President of the United States has called the Senate together under the Constitution upon an extraordinary occasion. He might summon the House of Representatives in the same manner. He can invoke the exercise of our power, but he cannot limit it; and I contend that we have the right in this as in every other session, in every other way that the Senate can be assembled, to pass whatever resolutions we please and do whatever business we see fit. I have no doubt that we have a right to originate legislation, to act upon it in committee, and to pass bills ready to be acted upon when Congress may be in session.

I say this simply for the purpose of protesting against the assumption which has been made that the resolution as originally offered was not in order and not within the competence of the Senate.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I desire to say in a word that I was led to make the suggestion to the honorable Senator from Alabama which he has adopted by this consideration: However we may differ on the most vital public questions so far as they are domestic questions, we desire to present, I am sure, to foreign governments absolute unity. Whatever the majority of the American people, represented by Congress, believe upon a question of foreign policy, that the united American people support. It seemed to me, therefore, that in making the declaration which the honorable Senator from Alabama proposes, so proper and timely as it is to make some declaration upon that subject, the proposition ought to avoid anything which might possibly lead to a difference of opinion on questions of order or questions of constitutional proceeding. That was all.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Alabama moves that the resolution submitted by him be printed and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

OFFICERS OF THE SENATE.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business of yesterday, being the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] providing for the election of certain officers of the Senate, the pending question being on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] to postpone the resolution indefinitely. Upon this motion the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. PENDLETON. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Ohio moves that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of executive business. All in favor of the motion will say "ay," those opposed "no." [Putting the question.] The noes seem to have it.

Mr. PENDLETON. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FERRY, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. SAULSBURY.] Were he here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. GROVER, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. VAN WYCK.] If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. KELLOGG, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DAVIS.] If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. McDILL, (when his name was called.) On this and kindred questions I am paired for the day with the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. GORMAN.] I make this announcement for the day.

Mr. PLATT, of Connecticut, (when his name was called.) I announce that I am paired with the Senator from Oregon, [Mr. SLATER,] who has been called home. I have the right, however, to vote to make a quorum.

Mr. SAUNDERS, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. WILLIAMS.] If he were here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. SEWELL, (when his name was called.) I am paired with my colleague, [Mr. MCPHERSON.]

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am paired with the Senator from Maine, [Mr. FRYE.] I make the announcement for the day. I shall be here all the time, however, notwithstanding I am paired.

Mr. PLUMB. I am paired with the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. VEST.] I make the announcement for the day.

The result was announced—yeas 25, nays 25; as follows:

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, I move to lay the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts upon the table. That is the easiest and best way to get rid of it. It has been annoying the Senate for some time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri moves that the resolution lie on the table.

Mr. COCKRELL. I call for the yeas and nays on the motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered and taken.

Mr. BECK. I am paired with the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] who is now absent. I should vote "yea" if he were here.

The result was announced—yeas 24, nays 24; as follows:

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts to the fact that there are some three hundred important nominations lying upon your table. It is very important that the Senate should give some attention to those.

Mr. DAWES. How many did the Senator say?

Mr. HARRIS. Somewhere in the neighborhood of three hundred; I do not know the exact number.

Mr. DAWES. I should like to know the ground for the Senator's statement.

Mr. HARRIS. I did not catch the remark of the Senator.

Mr. DAWES. I inquired of the Senator if he would furnish to the public the grounds for his statement, what evidence he has.

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator from Massachusetts is certainly not ignorant of the fact, upon evidence entirely satisfactory to him, that there is a large number of important nominations lying upon that table, that he has for more than one month refused to look at or to act upon. There are important treaties, with which the Senator is also familiar, demanding the attention of the Senate. And in order that the Senator from Massachusetts may no longer neglect the most important, if not the only, duties that devolve upon him at this session, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business where we can consider those treaties and those nominations that are made to fill vacancies by reason of which the public interest is suffering to-day as it has suffered for weeks heretofore. My motion is that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. DAWES. Will the Senator permit me to say a word?

Mr. HARRIS. Of course, if the Senator desires to be heard and will renew the motion, I will withdraw it; or if he is disinclined to do that, if upon the close of his remarks he will yield the floor to me, I will renew it.

Mr. DAWES. Most certainly I will yield to the Senator. That is a constitutional right the Senator has which I could not take away from him if I desired.

I wish to say, Mr. President, that I am not informed as the Senator is. I state distinctly that here in open session of this Senate I do not know that there is any nomination pending before the Senate, and if the Senator has come to that knowledge consistent with his duty and his oath, I wish the Senator would so communicate to the public, not only the fact which he has communicated, but——

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator allow me to call his attention to the seventy-third rule which shows exactly what executive secrets are? And the newspapers announce, as every Senator has a right to announce, day by day and every day, every nomination that comes to this Senate. The action that the Senate may take in respect to those nominations in executive session may fall within the forbidden rule; but the fact that a nomination has been made the Senator from Massachusetts knows is a public matter that every Senator as well as every other person has a perfect right to disclose.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, I have consulted the rule to which the Senator has called my attention, and I do not see anything in it about the newspapers. The Senator may have discovered something and may perhaps call my attention to it. I still assert my own ignorance; that is all—the Senator cannot complain of such a confession on my part—my ignorance here in open session of anything that transpires in executive session; and if I were to go to the newspapers, as the Senator seems to, for a rule of conduct or even for information to guide me in my duty here, I could not keep up with the Senator when the Senator says the Senate has received three hundred nominations.

Mr. HARRIS. If the Senator will suspend a moment, here is a message from the President now, and the moment it is received a copied slip of every nomination sent in it will be spread on that table for the Senator and me and all others to look at, and it is copied for the Associated Press as well.

Mr. DAWES. I will say——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If the Senator from Massachusetts will suspend, the Chair will receive a message from the President of the United States.

Mr. DAWES. Certainly.

A message in writing was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, I suppose that message will remain sealed until we reach an executive session.

Mr. HARRIS. I will tell you all about it in half a minute.

Mr. DAWES. I do not yield for the purpose of reading an executive message.

Mr. HARRIS, (advancing to the Secretary's table and taking the slip accompanying the message.) I want to give the Senator from Massachusetts information upon a subject on which he seems to lack it. Here [handing the slip to Mr. DAWES] is a list of the nominations just sent here to-day; and I beg him to announce them to the public, if we cannot get them through the press or in any other way.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator from Tennessee has put a piece of paper in my hand; and where he got it I do not know, [laughter,] or what right he has to it I do not know. [Laughter.] I should like to know whether the Executive has made the Senator from Tennessee a confidential communication upon this subject. I have no faith in this paper, sir.

I was remarking when the Senator interrupted me that whatever is sealed lying here upon the table of the Senate I do not know the contents of. The Senator seems to know, and he refers me to the newspapers. Now the ablest of these newspapers—and nothing can be so able as a newspaper—cannot keep up with the Senator by two-thirds at least.

The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. McMILLAN] suggests to me that this piece of paper being tissue paper, we ought to have no confidence in it on any side. [Laughter.] It is useful on the other side of the Senate to deceive the public and to carry before the country something that never existed, and when I come to think of it, and making my acknowledgments to the Senator from Minnesota, I do not wonder the Senator from Tennessee takes to it so. [Laughter.]

But the Senator from Tennessee has no occasion based upon any information which has reached me, and no authority based upon any information which has reached me, to state what he did to the Senate, and that was why I asked him for his information. It is not true in point of fact, so far as I am informed, though I confess that I have not received any confidential communication upon the subject, nor have I attempted to open any sealed messages from the President of the United States to the Senate of the United States. The Senator, however, stated a certain number as a fact, and now relies upon these pieces of paper from time to time, and all he has brought to my attention is one containing the names of five proposed postmasters. Now if the Senator knows that there are three hundred nominations pending, if he knows it outside of executive session, I wish he would state the authority. I do not know any such thing, and so far as I am informed the statement is not in conformity with the truth.

I will now yield to the Senator to renew his motion if he desires to make it, and on which he has been voted down more than twenty times already.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, for this specimen of frankness and candor upon the part of the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts I am profoundly grateful. I have learned from those gentlemen who served with him in the other end of the Capitol as well as gentlemen who have served with him here that, distinguished for many things as we all know, he has always been most distinguished for the frankness and candor with which he would always act!

Now, does the Senator pretend that he is ignorant of the fact, and does he intend these galleries and the country to doubt whether there are three hundred important nominations lying upon that desk? If his remarks mean anything, they mean to cast a shadow of doubt as to that fact, while I undertake to say and assert that the Senator knows as well as I know, as well as you, sir, know, the truth of the assertion that there are three hundred, or near three hundred, important nominations lying upon your table undisposed of and unconsidered.

But I will not dwell upon it. I renew the motion to proceed to the consideration of executive business, with the hope that that three hundred may be rapidly reduced by the consideration and action of the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Tennessee moves that the Senate do now proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. COCKRELL and Mr. VANCE called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BUTLER, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON.] I announce it now for the day.

Mr. FARLEY, (when Mr. SLATER's name was called.) I was requested by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. SLATER] to announce that he is paired with the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. PLATT.] The pair is for the residue of the session. I make that announcement now.

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. COKE. My colleague [Mr. MAXEY] is paired with the Senator from Colorado, [Mr. TELLER.]

The result was announced—yeas 24, nays 24; as follows:

YEAS—24.

Bayard,	Farley,	Jackson,	Pendleton,
Brown,	George,	Johnston,	Pugh,
Call,	Groome,	Jonas,	Ransom,

Davis of Illinois,	Grover,	Platt of Conn.,	Van Wyck,
Edmunds,	Hale,	Plumb,	Vest,
Fair,	Jones of Nevada,	Saulsbury,	Williams.

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I move to lay the resolution on the table, and ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 24, nays 25; as follows:

YEAS—24.

Bayard,	Davis of W. Va.,	Hill of Georgia,	Pendleton,
Beck,	Farley,	Jackson,	Pugh,
Brown,	George,	Johnston,	Ransom,
Call,	Groome,	Jonas,	Vance,

Edmunds,	Jones of Nevada,	Plumb,	Vest,
Fair,	Kellogg,	Saulsbury,	Williams.
Ferry,	Lamar,	Saunders.

So the Senate refused to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. It is rumored around this morning that our friends on the opposite side wish at an early hour to-day to renew their consultation of this morning. To give them an opportunity I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. COCKRELL in the chair.) The Senator from West Virginia moves that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. DAWES. Another illustration of the little ground there is and the want of safety in a man's governing his conduct by rumors. I hope the Senate will not adjourn but will address itself to the business of the Senate.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. It is strange everything brings the Senator from Massachusetts to his feet——

Mr. HOAR. Is the motion debatable?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is not if anybody raises the point of order.

Mr. HOAR. I raise it.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. All right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from West Virginia moves that the Senate do now adjourn. [Putting the question.] The Chair is in doubt.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MORRILL, (when his name was called.) On this vote I am paired with the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. JOHNSTON.]

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. KELLOGG. This is a motion to adjourn; I am not paired on that motion, and I vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 23, nays 25; as follows:

YEAS—23.

Bayard,	Davis of W. Va.,	Hill of Georgia,	Pugh,
Beck,	Farley,	Jackson,	Ransom,
Brown,	George,	Jonas,	Vance,
Call,	Groome,	Lamar,	Voorhees,

Fair,	Jones of Florida,	Plumb,	Vest,
Ferry,	Jones of Nevada,	Saulsbury,	Williams.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, I hope we may have a vote on the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] to postpone the resolution indefinitely.

Mr. COKE. Mr. President, I move that the Senate do now proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. [Putting the question.] The Chair is in doubt.

Mr. COKE. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered and taken.

Mr. MORRILL. I am paired with the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. JOHNSTON.]

The result was announced—yeas 24, nays 24; as follows:

YEAS—24.

Bayard,	Davis of W. Va.,	Hill of Georgia,	Pendleton,
Beck,	Farley,	Jackson,	Pugh,
Brown,	George,	Jonas,	Ransom,

Coke,	Harris,	Morgan,	Walker.

NAYS—24.

Allison,	Conkling,	Hill of Colorado,	Miller,
Anthony,	Dawes,	Hoar,	Mitchell,
Blair,	Edgerton,	Ingalls,	Platt of N. Y.,
Burnside,	Hale,	Logan,	Rollins,

Ferry,	Kellogg,	Saulsbury,	Williams.

So the motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs upon the motion of the Senator from Tennessee to postpone indefinitely.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I move that when the Senate adjourns it be to meet at eleven o'clock to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from West Virginia moves that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet at eleven o'clock to-morrow. [Putting the question.] The Chair is in doubt.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. COKE. I move to amend the pending motion by making the hour half past eleven o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas moves to amend the motion of the Senator from West Virginia by striking out eleven o'clock and inserting half after eleven. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia, called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. BECK. I move to amend the amendment by making the time 11.45, and on that I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. CONKLING. That amendment is not in order, I think, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is an amendment to an amendment, and the Chair decides that it is order. The Senator from Kentucky moves to amend the amendment of the Senator from Texas to the motion of the Senator from West Virginia by striking out "eleven" and inserting "eleven forty-five," on which the yeas and nays are called for.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BLAIR, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Alabama, [Mr. MORGAN.]

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 24, nays 24; as follows:

YEAS—24.

Bayard,	Davis of W. Va.,	Hill of Georgia,	Pendleton,
Beck,	Farley,	Jackson,	Pugh,
Brown,	George,	Johnston,	Ransom,

Conkling,	Hill of Colorado,	Miller,	Sherman.

ABSENT—28.

Davis of Illinois,	Grover,	Platt of Conn.,	Van Wyck,
Edmunds,	Jones of Nevada,	Plumb,	Vest,
Fair,	Kellogg,	Saulsbury,	Williams.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BECK. As we were a tie on that, perhaps another minute may help it, and I move to make the hour of meeting 11.46 to-morrow. That minute may save some of our friends.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kentucky moves to amend the amendment of the Senator from Texas by inserting 11.46.

Mr. BECK. And on that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. DAWES. What is the motion, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion was that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet at eleven o'clock to-morrow. The Senator from Kentucky moves to amend by fixing the time of meeting to-morrow at forty-six minutes after eleven o'clock.

Mr. DAWES. Pending that motion I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at one o'clock and forty-six minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

Mr. BECK, (when Mr. WILLIAMS'S name was called.) The pair of my colleague [Mr. WILLIAMS] continues with the Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. SAUNDERS.]

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I am paired with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] until his return.

Mr. RANSOM. I am paired with the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN.]

The result was announced—yeas 20, nays 21; as follows:

So the Senate refused to proceed to the consideration of executive business.

A message in writing was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I have had no disposition to take part in this debate, and should have carried out my purpose to remain silent but for the most remarkable and uncalled-for philippic of the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] and some novel and extraordinary propositions of his republican colleagues, which have made it necessary for me to enter into a vindication of my own course and to fulfill a promise made to the honorable Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. BURNSIDE.]

It is not an agreeable duty—a very ungracious duty—but nevertheless a duty; and I shall endeavor to discharge it fearlessly, and with becoming consideration for the feelings of my brother Senators and a due regard for those amenities of debate that should always control us in this high and dignified branch of the national Legislature. And if in the heat of earnest discussion I should appear to transcend the limits of parliamentary propriety, I trust it may not be regarded as intentional or wanting in a proper estimate of senatorial decorum.

Mr. President, on the 20th of this month referring to some observations made by the Senator from Maine, [Mr. FRYE,] who I regret very much is not in his seat, in a colloquy between the honorable Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. BURNSIDE] and myself, I used the following language:

> The Senator sat there and heard that tirade; but when I rise and attempt to vindicate myself, the Senator comes to the front and declares that whoever says there was a bargain in this Chamber, has uttered a falsehood.
> Mr. BURNSIDE. Well, I do say so yet.
> Mr. BUTLER. I have made no such charge; but, Mr. President, if I do not demonstrate it by irrefragable testimony I will resign my seat in this Senate.

Again I said:

> The Senator from Maine arraigned the entire South almost; he arraigned every Senator from the South, charging that we are here the representatives of States that have repudiated their public obligations, as an excuse for something that is being done in this Senate.

Further on I said:

> But, Mr. President, I have been betrayed into saying a great deal more than I intended when I rose. I repeat that at the proper time if the remarks of the Senator from Maine, in my judgment, shall require further notice at my hands as to what he may have said about my State and the condition of affairs down there, I shall take occasion to ask the Senate to hear me in response; but for the present I desire to repeat that that is not the issue. The real issue is whether or not a bargain has been made on this floor by which it is proposed on the one part to take something which does not belong to the republican caucus or the democratic caucus or both combined in exchange for the influence or the vote or the power of any man or set of men, to wit, the officers of this Senate. They do not belong to us. They belong to the sovereign people of this country, and we control them in trust for the people and not to barter away for political power.

I regret extremely that the Senator from Maine who saw fit to make this arraignment of myself and my associates and my people is not in his seat. I regret that circumstances will not permit me to postpone what I have to say until his return; for I shall have something to say about him, and about his State, which I should prefer to have him hear.

I said, Mr. President, that I made no charge of a bargain in the Senate, and I repeat it. I said further that I would produce the evidence which in my judgment would go to establish beyond all doubt that a bargain had been made; and in proceeding to do that I wish it to be understood that with the motives and purposes and intentions of Senators, as individuals, I have nothing to do. I am not here to impeach motives, to call in question the individual integrity and honesty of Senators. The junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. MAHONE] says that "no man can search the human heart." That is true. No power but the power of Omniscience and Omnipotence can "search the human heart" and interpret its mysterious operations; but in making ordinances and rules and regulations for the government and protection of society, mankind provided that men who are twenty-one years of age, who are sui juris, who are not under duress, should be held responsible for their acts as well as their utterances. While I do not attempt to "search the human heart" and determine what motives influence Senators or gentlemen, I have the right, and it is my duty as a Senator, to criticise, legitimately, the public acts, the public votes, and the public utterances of all Senators and all men who belong to the public.

It is not my habit, it has never been my habit, to impugn the motives or question the integrity of any Senator; and while it is true that we cannot "search the human heart," how many human beings have been sent to the gallows and to the State's prison for life upon circumstantial evidence! How many of the greatest and most revolting crimes in history have been investigated and determined upon circumstantial or presumptive evidence, when no eye saw and no ear heard the actor committing the crime! It is also true that there can be no crime without intent. The presence of criminal intent is necessary to constitute crime or wrong-doing, but mankind frequently determines the character of the crime committed or wrong done by the acts of the individual, by circumstances, by indirect evidence, not by the plea of not guilty or the protestations of the accused or suspected. It is not sufficient in the affairs of this life, in a civilized country, to meet a charge by the plea of not guilty and by the counter charges of falsehood and cowardice and slander and revolution and treason. No, sir, charges are not met in that way. The law demands something more substantial, and in the conduct of human affairs the interests of society are more exacting.

In the familiar illustration of a man who stands upon a house-top and recklessly throws a billet of wood upon a crowded street below and kills one of the passers-by, whom perhaps he had never seen or heard of before, will it avail for that man to come before a court of justice and say, "I am not guilty;" "I never saw the deceased;" "I had no malice against him," (and malice is a necessary ingredient to constitute murder;) "it is a cruel falsehood to charge me with murder." This does not satisfy society, it does not satisfy the law made for the protection of society. So the law intervenes, and says, "Although you may never have seen or known the deceased, you have a heart devoid of social duty and fatally bent on mischief," and the law implies malice from the reckless act of hurling the billet of wood from the house-top into the crowded highway and destroying the life of the innocent. So there are innumerable examples that I might use to illustrate the proposition, that acts and circumstances sometimes "speak louder than words;" as true when applied to political action and official life as to law or morals or social duty.

I repeat, I have nothing to do with the motives of the Senator from Virginia. I make no charges against him. I have nothing but the kindest feelings personally for him; but when he and his new political allies rise from their seats in this Senate and charge me with "revolution and treason," it is my duty, it becomes necessary for me in vindication of myself, to account for the course that I am taking, and for the votes that I cast. If there has been nothing improper, if there has been no political arrangement by which the offices of the Senate are proposed to be transferred from one party to the other for an improper purpose, then my conduct is unjustifiable, but if I believe conscientiously, from the evidence, not from my own say-so, that there has been, it is my bounden and sworn duty to act accordingly and prevent if I can by all constitutional and lawful means the consummation of that which I believe will bring trouble and disaster upon this country and upon the liberties of the people.

"Political bargains" may be established by circumstantial evidence as well as crime. "Political bargains" are sometimes made by political parties and receive the assent of men who, as individuals, would never think of consenting to them. Where party ambition, party exigency, the love of party power, become aroused and a line of policy is entered upon, every member of that party is swept along before its irresistible power, the honorable and the dishonorable, the courageous and the cowards, the patriot and the demagogue, the statesman and the time-server, and honorable men sometimes find themselves obeying the behests of party dictation, involved in measures and policies against which their private judgment and feelings revolt. It will always be so, Mr. President, while party tyranny is so unrelenting and exacting, like the cyclone in nature, when it bursts from a cloud and sweeps over the face of the earth, tearing up by the roots the strong, sturdy monarch of the forest, at the same time that it carries before its whirling tempest the chaff and dry leaves of autumn. Many allowances should therefore be made. Many are made for the weakness of partisans who are unwilling to brook the displeasure and encounter the frowns of less scrupulous party friends by resisting the unconscionable demands of party.

But if when I propose to vindicate myself and those with whom I am acting and to justify our official conduct in this senatorial contest I am met with denunciation instead of facts, argument, and reason, the country will not be satisfied, the people will not be satisfied. I had never made any charges upon the Senator from Virginia, I had never charged him with being a repudiationist, I had never charged him with treachery to the party that elected him to the Senate, I had never charged him with a want of fidelity to his trusts; and yet, in the first utterance he made on this floor, he takes occasion to arraign every democratic Senator who did not choose to admit that he was right in all that he was doing.

But, Mr. President, recurring, what is the evidence which demonstrates the existence of a "political bargain?" What is that evidence? What is that circumstancial presumptive evidence by which it is proven? Hundreds of criminals have been sent to the gallows and hanged until they were dead with not one particle of direct evidence as to the crime with which they were charged. The power and force and efficacy of circumstantial evidence run through the entire civil and criminal code of this and all civilized countries, and it has been affirmed by men learned in the law to be in many cases the very strongest and most conclusive and convincing of all evidence. Now, what are the facts and circumstances, and the inevitable inferences and conclusions to be drawn from them, going to establish the truth of the charges that have been made? They may be grouped and formulated as follows:

First. The Senator from Virginia [Mr. MAHONE] was elected to the Senate by a democratic constituency, as a democrat, and Second. His purpose to vote with the republicans was never announced to the public until his first vote in this Chamber developed that fact.

Third. Following close upon this "new departure" and that vote was the assignment of the Senator, by the republican caucus, to the chairmanship of an important committee of this body.

Fourth. In a brief space of time followed the nomination by the republican caucus of Mr. Riddleberger, a democrat, his intimate personal and political friend, for Sergeant-at-Arms, and the Senator says he is responsible for that nomination.

Fifth. The nomination of Mr. George C. Gorham for Secretary of the Senate, the editor of the republican organ in this city, who had earnestly espoused the Senator in his newspaper, although he (the editor) is an uncompromising "stalwart" republican, and the Senator a "better democrat than the Senator from Georgia," [Mr. HILL.]

Sixth. The appointment, by the Senator, as clerk of his committee of the brother-in-law of said Gorham.

Seventh. The nomination, by the President, of the personal and political friends of the Senator to important Federal positions in Virginia, although the Senator says, and they say, they are democrats.

Eighth. The President has not appointed other democrats, the political friends of any other democratic Senators in any other State, to important Federal positions.

Ninth. The Senator has voted one hundred and twelve times, up to April 26, since he has been a member of the Senate, and every time with the republicans—never with the democrats—although he said in his speech, printed in the RECORD on the 31st of March last, that "I was elected to the Senate of the United States to do their will, [meaning his constituents,] not to a caucus to do its petty bidding."

Tenth. By said votes the Senator is carrying out the will of the republican caucus as obediently as if he had never belonged to any other party.

Eleventh. He moved his seat from the democratic to the republican side of the Chamber, and appears to obey the dictation and "bidding" of the republican caucus and republican Senators as absolutely as if they controlled his will and senatorial action.

Twelfth. The republican caucus and republican Senators have refused to transact the business for which the Senate was convened in extraordinary session until they shall have disorganized the Senate and elected the friends of the Senator to the vacancies which they seek to create, thereby paralyzing the executive arm of the Government, preventing the proper discharge of the public business, obstructing the wheels of the government—all this to reward the Senator for his votes and for the political power that his vote gives them.

Thirteenth. The Senator still claims to be a democrat, but votes steadily with the republicans.

Fourteenth. The Senator avowed in his speeches that he "is the custodian of his own democracy," and yet he has transferred the custody of it to the republican caucus and votes its "bidding."

Fifteenth. The action of the Senator and the republican caucus in seeking to turn out faithful officers at an executive session of the Senate and elect and install others, some of whom are untried and inexperienced, is without precedent in the history of the Government.

Sixteenth. Mr. Riddleberger is, as he avows, a "democrat" and unreconstructed; a "readjuster" or repudiationist, and must therefore be objectionable and offensive to republican Senators.

Seventeenth. The republican Senator from Ohio avows that "anything that will beat down that party (the democratic) and build up our own (the republican) is justifiable in morals and law." Corrupt bargains, perjury, murder, piracy, rapine, arson, rape, incendiarism—"anything" is "justifiable," says that Senator.

Eighteenth. The same Senator and others of his caucus propose to buy our acquiescence in their corrupt party policy by tendering pay to the present democratic employés of the Senate until next December, if we will allow the election of Riddleberger and Gorham, and this, too, without the semblance of law or right.

Nineteenth. The Senator from Virginia and other republican Senators have assailed the motives and questioned the official integrity of every democratic Senator on this floor, because they vote as their conscience dictates; and we have a right to assume that they do this to divert the attention of the country from this unnatural alliance, and bolster up and give plausibility to an untenable and wrong position.

Twentieth. The Senator from Virginia has said that he has nothing to apologize for respecting his part in the confederate army, is, therefore, unreconstructed, and the President of the United States has said that he will shake hands with no man who has not expressed repentance for his sins of rebellion; and there must therefore be some other reason for the interchange of political and personal favors than political affinity and personal regard.

Twenty-first. The Senator from Virginia and some of his new political allies, instead of inviting investigation of charges that have been made, far and wide, of corrupt practices, seek to prevent on this floor free speech and legitimate discussion touching those charges, by threats and denunciation.

Twenty-second. The reason assigned for this extraordinary coalition is that the Senator from Virginia is in favor of "a free ballot and fair count" in Virginia; that it secures "a free ballot and fair count;" whereas there is no evidence here or elsewhere that the "ballot" is not perfectly "free" and count "perfectly fair" in Virginia. The elections in that State are managed by three election judges—one republican, one readjuster, and one democrat—and if there is not a free ballot and fair count the fault lies with the republican and readjuster.

Twenty-third. It has heretofore been the unbroken, universal rule and practice of the republicans to nominate none but republicans for Sergeant-at-Arms, and make none but republicans chairmen of the committees, when in the majority, except as to the last, to give unimportant chairmanships to three of the oldest democratic members of the Senate. They have never before made a democratic Senator chairman of one of their important committees—in this case one who has been recently sworn in—and never before have the republican caucus nominated for the important position of Sergeant-at-Arms a democrat unreconstructed and a repudiationist.

That, Mr. President, is the evidence upon which I rely to establish what has been charged by others. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] in justifying this new alliance said that it was the commonest thing in the world for gentlemen to change their opinions. He cited the instance of Mr. Doolittle and others. I should like the Senator to tell me if Mr. Doolittle or any other of the great lights of the republican party, immediately upon the change of their political opinions, were rewarded with high honors and emoluments by the party to which they transferred their allegiance. My friend the distinguished Senator from Georgia [Mr. BROWN] has been held up as an instance of a man who had changed his political opinions. With that frankness which becomes him he says, "Yes, I did change, and I changed again to the democratic party, and I changed to it when the republican party was in the full flush of its power and could have given me almost any office at my request." But I ask the Senator from Ohio, I ask any republican Senator, if he can point to an instance in the history of this Government where any Senator has changed and was so soon thereafter rewarded with personal positions of honor and had his friends rewarded by the party and the Administration to which he had changed?

Mr. President, it is said that you want "a free ballot and a fair count" in the South; you want to dissolve "the solid South." I hope I may not be considered as individually offensive to any republican Senator on that side when I say "a free ballot and a fair count" is the last thing that you want, and I have only to turn to the record of the last election to show how absolutely empty and unreal that claim is.

"A free ballot and a fair count!" when the gallant democratic State which my distinguished friend on my left [Mr. VOORHEES] so ably represents in part on this floor was colonized with colored voters from the South immediately preceding the last election to nullify and neutralize the democratic vote of that State. A "free ballot and a fair count!" when you sent your emmissaries into Indiana with bags of money, and they camped upon that State prepared to buy every venal voter who offered himself for sale; when you spent millions all over the country buying suffrages and corrupting the suffragans; when your powerful corporations and monopolies coerced their employés, dependent upon them for their daily bread, to vote their will and their bidding, and made a travesty and mockery of free elections. "A free ballot and a fair count!" If I do not show as to Maine before I get through that such a thing as "a free ballot and a fair count" is scarcely known there, then I shall be more mistaken in the effect of evidence than I have ever been before in my life.

The Senator from Virginia said in his speech:

> The desire of our people for cordial relations with all sections of a common country and the people of all the States of the Union, their devotion to popular education, their efforts for the free enjoyment of a priceless suffrage and an honest count of ballots, their determination to make Virginia, in the public belief, a desirable home for all men, wherever their birthplace, whatever their opinions, and to open her fields and her mines to enterprise and capital, and to stay the retrograde movement of years, so as to bring her back from the fifteenth in grade to her original position among the first in the sisterhood of States, forbid that my action here should be controlled or influenced by a caucus whose party has waged war upon my constituency and where party success is held paramount to what I conceive to be the interests of Virginia and the welfare of the whole country.

He asks a blessing for Virginia. He will pardon me for saying that "the voice is Jacob's voice, but the hand is the hand of Esau." I think I hear the republican party coming to him, and in the language of Rebekah to her son, exclaiming, "Upon me be thy curse, my son; only obey my voice, and go fetch me them." The republican party says this to the Senator, and the Senator responds, responds for Virginia with "the voice of Jacob" but with the "hand of Esau." He says that he is called upon to defend Virginia from those who attack her and ought to have been her defenders. I have never attacked Virginia; I could not find it in my heart to attack that State. I have seen her fair bosom rent and torn by the rough plowshare of war. I have seen too much of the uncomplaining, unflagging devotion of her fair and beautiful daughters, and splendid gallantry and daring genius of her peerless sons. I have received too much of kindness and hospitality and consideration at their hands to attack Virginia, and I have given some evidence at least of my desire to defend her by taking the chances of death upon her beautiful hills and classic fields, and so has the Senator. I have made no attack upon that old State. My own blood is mingled with her dust, and I would as soon think of attacking the graveyards of my own dead as to attack her. If I had any inclination to attack anybody in Virginia it would be those of her sons whose course, I believe, is bringing dishonor and degradation upon her. If I had any disposition to attack "the old mother of States" or any of her sons, or her people, it would be those who are asking blessings in her name and receiving them for themselves. I have not only not attacked Virginia, but I have attacked none of her sons. But I am not content as a southern Senator to permit her junior Senator, or any other Senator, to impugn my motives and asperse my integrity because I see fit to vote as my inclinations dictate in this body.

The Senator has attacked his people, not I. He denounces all of those of her gallant sons who do not agree with him as "Bourbon, funder debt-payers." Just what he means by "Bourbonism" I do not know, but I have taken the trouble to find out some of the effects of "Bourbon" government in Virginia, and I find that under it her population has increased 23 per cent. I find that one of her principal cities (Lynchburgh) has increased in population 133 per cent., and that her capital city has increased 25 per cent.; that Norfolk has increased 14 per cent., and Petersburgh 14 per cent. I find that her principal product, tobacco, has increased 115 per cent. under "Bourbon rule." I find that her railroad construction has increased 30 per cent. under "Bourbon rule." And I have found another thing, that just as the public confidence was beginning to be restored in her securities the speech of the honorable Senator caused them to decline in the markets of this country at least 10 per cent. Yet the Senator says we are attacking Virginia! To outside "barbarians," "Bourbon sympathizers," it looks as if a little more "Bourbonism" and a little less "readjusterism" would be good for her. Mr. President, whatever may be my fate or the fate of this discussion or of all concerned in it or of its effects, I shall always cherish for Virginia sentiments of the warmest affection and wish for her people the choicest of God's blessings.

And now I crave the indulgence of the Senate while I discuss another matter. The Senator from Maine apologized for the remarks he made in this Chamber upon the ground that he was a new member here, "the youngest Senator," I believe he said, and then proceeded to read us all a lecture on this side of the Chamber, assailed our civilization, arraigned our people, attacked our habits and methods of life, denounced our politics, morals, and customs, and took his departure for the North. Well, Mr. President,

> He who fights and runs away
> May live to fight another day.

The Senator has gone. I am sorry he is not here. He arraigned my State. He said we did not have "a free ballot and a fair count," and he used this unfortunate expression:

> Ah, it is easy to shoot labor when it has been ground down for a hundred years by slavery.

Then he complains that my friend the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL] should have referred to the ballot in New England, and complains that he said that they were required to educate their people before they could exercise the ballot, to impose educational and other suffrage qualifications. He said that the civilization of the South was founded upon barbarism, and the civilization of the North (meaning, I suppose, New England) was founded upon the Bible, and the school-book, &c; that there were two civilizations in this country; there had been an "irrepressible conflict" between slave labor and free labor, and he arraigned the entire South for her "barbarism" and want of civilization; that we had been conquered; and he rattled the raw-head and bloody-bones of war and famine and revolution at us with terrible significance. So far as my own State is concerned I would simply say this: She needs no defense at my hands. Her records under democratic government answer the calumnies against her and I confidently refer to them. I wish I had time to run through the catalogue of crimes under the rule of his friends in that State from 1868 to 1876. I could show her debt increased from about five to twenty million dollars; taxes amounting to about ten millions more wrung from impoverished people, stolen, squandered, wasted; race conflicts, riots, lawlessness, ballot-box stuffing, crime, confusion, disorder, anarchy; public officials holding high carnival in debauchery, profligacy, robbery, conspiracy. I could show all this. I could show that in one year the republican Legislature spent for public printing $385,000. The democratic Legislature spent only $6,178 for the same purpose. The republican Legislature spent for legislative expenses in one year $1,533,574, and in four years $4,187,573. The democratic administration for the same purpose spent in one year but $84,096, and so on through the list. But I have not the time.

Now, under democratic rule the expenses for the public service are reduced to the minimum of economy and are about one-fourth of the radical expenses. Peace, quiet, order, prosperity, progress, good feeling prevail throughout the State.

The Senator would invite us to another republican feast like the one which broke up in confusion, terror, flight, in 1876. I shall decline the invitation. The whole people of the State decline, except the vampires who fattened (and fled) on the vulgar viands of radical debauchery. No, sir, we want no more of it, and we will not have it. I refer the Senator to any twenty of the most respectable, intelligent, patriotic republicans in that State, ay to any 20,000, and let him ask them if they would have the State remanded to republican hands such as controlled it in the flush days of radical rule. Let him ask them if it would be a good thing for them, for the State, for the whole country, to exchange the present democratic government for any that the republicans could organize. By their answer I will abide, and this is my answer to his assault upon South Carolina.

And just in that connection, although not bearing especially upon my State, I will ask leave to read an extract from an address delivered before some of the leading citizens of Springfield, Massachusetts, the other day, by General Armstrong, principal of the Industrial and Normal Schools for Negroes and Indians, at Hampton, Virginia. He spoke as follows:

> The sentiment throughout the South on the subject of education is highly encouraging. The change in twenty years is the most wonderful in all the history of civilization. Our graduates go into the Carolinas, the Virginias, and Maryland, and they never report to me that they have been the subject of hostility or outrage. In all those five States the negro teacher finds great encouragement and warm support from the best white people. They write me constantly about it. You people at the North have no idea of the degree of interest which has sprung up at the South in educational matters. Your northern papers, except here in Springfield, do not give much space to southern affairs, except to southern politics. Why, their colleges for the white youth are crowded with young men who are living on hominy to get an education, as their fathers did when they fought under Lee. You may be surprised if I tell you the fact that one of the greatest obstacles to the success of our graduates is not the white opposition but the opposition of the old colored preachers, men without education, wedded to a religion which largely consists of sensuous excitement. When one of our teachers goes into the Sabbath school, as they are taught to do, they are quite likely to take more decided ground against lying and stealing than the old minister who was brought up to "revivals," and a struggle for influence ensues, in which the old dispensation holds that "edication is taking that young man to hell."

There, Mr. President, is a voice which I suppose will be heeded by the Senator from Maine in reply to his charges of "barbarism" upon the South. I think he will not deny that authority. And is this eternal, everlasting, insatiate, insatiable, crusade upon the South never to stop? If secession was a crime and a mistake, oh, how egregiously has the South suffered for it! If maintaining slavery in her midst was a crime, how the revenges of time have settled with her for it! Is there then never to be a cessation, a stop to tantalizing, misrepresenting, calumniating a people who have had a problem to deal with that no people have ever had since civilization dawned on the earth—such a problem, I say, as no people have ever had to solve. They have been and are doing the best they can to solve it, fairly and honestly and truthfully, and in accordance with that love of constitutional liberty and republican freedom which was born with them. It seems to me that, instead of helping us to solve it, the republican party have thrown obstacles in our way, and then curse and anathematize and abuse and misrepresent us because we act with the northern democracy. In all those dark days, in all those days of terror and suffering and wrong, that the Anglo-Saxon race of the South was subjected to, not a word of kindness, not an expression of relief, not a whisper of sympathy did we get from anybody at the North except the brave, gallant democracy of that section—not a whisper. When we were down, when we were being tramped upon, when we were being robbed, our republican friends sat silent as the grave and never extended a finger for our relief; but as long as their political allies, the solid republican South, were plying their avocation, everthing was lovely and the people had to submit. When in the course of time, in God's own providence, that nightmare was shaken off by the gigantic efforts of the Anglo-Saxon race and it became democratic, then the hue and cry is raised from one end of the country to the other, "The solid South menaces the liberties of this country," and in the language of the Senator from Maine is a wicked, criminal usurpation of the rights of the people. "O Consistency, thou art indeed a jewel!" How men's minds and souls and bodies are warped and deformed by the love and lust of political power! And how conveniently cant and hypocrisy enable men to shift their political sails and back and fill before any breeze!

I know not, Mr. President, whether the South is solid or not. I do say, however, that so far as our democratic solidity is concerned, she is solid for good government; she is solid for the honest administration of affairs; she is solid for the education of her children; she is solid for the development of her industries; she is solid in encouraging the people of all sections of this country to come and live under her beautiful climate and partake of the almost boundless possibilities of her future; she is solid for the peace and order of society, and there is not a sentiment in the heart of any man in the South, who is a man, that feels a scintilla of hostility for the colored race. Why should we? As the Senator from Maine said, pathetically, they stayed at home while we were at the front in the army of the confederacy and protected our wives and children. So they did; and I hope God may strike me down and paralyze my right arm if I have cherished a sentiment of hostility to those kind-hearted people who protected my wife and children.

No, sir, it is a base calumny upon the manhood and the courage and the honor of the southern men to say that they would oppress the weak and the lowly and the humble-born. I wish I could take that Senator, I wish I could take all those Senators, to my home—and I hope I shall be excused for the egotism—I wish I could take that Senator to my home, among those people who have known me from my infancy, and ask them if I have ever done them a wrong; ask them if I have not, when their republican friends were standing back, gone to the front in their defense and to their assistance. I should like for him to go to-day to my home, upon my farm, and see the one hundred and thirty-six colored people there, and ask them whether I ever did them an injury or not.

I am not quite prepared to admit, however, and the Senators, if they give expression to their honest sentiments, are not quite prepared to admit that those people, recently released from slavery, are fit to be judges and governors and legislators and magistrates; and when the Senator from Maine says, "we educate our voters in New England;" and says, "why do not you educate yours in the South?" I throw back to him the inquiry, that when you had absolute control of those people, when you were reconstructing the governments of the South, when you controlled every office from governor to constable and dictated every line of the reconstruction measures, why did you not provide an educational qualification for the suffrage in South Carolina? The white people of that State had no voice in the form and character of the charter which was to be the organic law of their future government; from which they were to derive protection for their lives, their liberties, their families, and their property. They were as voiceless as the tomb and as powerless as the shorn Samson.

It is not very becoming, Mr. President, in Senators now to taunt us with the ignorance of suffrage in the South when they themselves created it, and all they did toward helping the poor freedman was to establish the Freedman's Bureau and the Freedman's Bank. The Senator from Maine says that the savings banks of Massachusetts have millions upon millions of the savings of the laboring classes of Massachusetts put away safely. Oh, Mr. President, so did those poor freedmen when you organized that vortex to draw into it the sweat, the muscle, the labor, the toil of those poor people never to get it again. Of course Massachusetts has millions of money deposited in her savings banks. She had the Freedman's Bank to draw on as well as the savings of the mechanics of Massachusetts. You organized the Freedman's Bank sanctioned by the great power of this Government, and you drew into it, under the pretext of philanthropy and guardianship and protection, millions of money from those poor people, and you have never paid it back to them.

The Senator says that the civilization of the South is founded upon the barbarism of slavery. Well, Mr. President, it is not a matter of much practical consequence at this day and generation who is responsible for slavery in this country; but inasmuch as we are making history, as it is said, (not very creditable perhaps,) and inasmuch as the Senator has invited us into this arena, instead of to the hustings, to discuss the facts of history with him, I will read a letter from Hon. Jeremiah S. Black to Hon. James A. Garfield in 1876 on the subject of slavery. He says:

> The Plymouth colony and the province of Massachusetts Bay were proslavery to the backbone. If you doubt this, I refer you to Moore's History of Slavery in Massachusetts, where the evidence (consisting chiefly of records and documents perfectly authenticated) is produced and collated with a fullness and fairness which cannot be questioned. The Plymouth immigrants planted precisely the doctrine which you ascribe to the Jamestown colonists; that is to say, they held that "the negro had no rights of manhood, that the white man might buy, own, and sell him and his offspring forever." Practically and theoretically they maintained that human slavery in its most malignant form was a perfectly just, proper, and desirable institution, &c.

Then he goes on to say:

> They executed this theory—

That is the Massachusetts people—> to the fullest extent in their own wars with the Indians. Without cause or provocation, and without notice or warning, they fell upon the Pequods, massacred many of them, and made slaves of the survivors, without distinction of age or sex. About seven hundred, including many women and children, were sent to the West Indies and there sold on public account, the proceeds being put in the colonial treasury. Eight score of these unfortunate people escaped from the butchery by flight, and afterward gave themselves up, &c.

Then he goes on to say that the Indians did not make good slaves, that they were insubordinate, that they were restless; and the good, pious people of Massachusetts sent them to the West Indies to exchange them for blackamoors or Africans. Not content with enslaving the Africans and the Indians, they enslaved the white heretics who approached their shores and sent them off and exchanged them for Africans.

This document is so luminous with great thoughts and historic verity, so full of patriotic wisdom and constitutional learning, that I shall ask to incorporate it as an appendix to my remarks. It should be preserved among the archives of the Government, and I commend it, prayerfully do I commend it to my friends on the other side, when they rise and charge that the southern civilization is based upon the "barbarism" of slavery.

Who are some of the offsprings of that "civilization?" Washington, Jefferson, Madison, Monroe, Henry, Wirt, Marshall, the Randolphs, the Lees, Taney, Pinkney, Macon, Gaston, Mangum, the Rutledges, the Pinckneys, the Marions, the Sumters, the Pickens, the Hamptons, the Calhouns, the Lowndes, Troup, Crawford, Benton, the Jacksons, Davis, the Clays, Lewis, the Crittendens, the Prestons, the Breckinridges, Thomas, Canby, Drayton, Gibbon, Scott, and Taylor. The great naval hero, Admiral Farragut, whose monument this entire city turned out to see uncovered, was one of the "barbarians" who rose from that "civilization." He whom the Senator seeks to preserve in enduring brass in a public park of this city was one of the "barbarians" from that "civilization." George H. Thomas, for whom you have made an equestrian statue in one of our handsomest reservations, who led the armies of the Union as perhaps few others of those great soldiers led them, was another of the "barbarians" whom the Senator now seeks to denounce.

Mr. President, I remember when as a boy I attended the deliberations of the Senate, and subsequently to have heard something about the "slave oligarchy," that it was arrogant, aggressive, strong. Perhaps it was; I will not argue that; but one thing I can say for it and its illustrious associates of the North: in the history of this Government they never plundered the public Treasury, they never organized "Credit Mobiliers," they never made possible "Black Friday," they never had five circuit judges of the United States court to resign their seats under the threat of impeachment for corruption and fraud, they never had their Representatives kicked out of Congress for "selling cadetships," they never traced corrupt contracts to the very door of the White House, they never had race conflicts, they never had rotten borough governments to rob the people, sustaining them with bayonets, they did not drive American commerce from the high seas to put public plunder in their pockets; their great statesmen never had their debts paid by corporations and manufacturing companies. They may have been aggressive, they may have been strong, they may have been arrogant, but none of these sins that I have enumerated, and many more that I might enumerate from republican history, can be laid at their doors truthfully.

The Senator tells us about an "irrepressible conflict." Yes, sir, there was an irrepressible conflict between free and slave labor. There were two civilizations moving toward each other on converging lines. They met at Fort Sumter and there the combustion took place, the issue was joined. Then for four years there was a "battle of the giants," such a battle as the world has never seen; until at Appomattox one giant fell covered with wounds and blood and fatigue and want and exhaustion. He surrendered; and with that was buried that "irrepressible conflict." Down with it, forever and for aye, went the institution of slavery; and I am glad of it. Down with it in a grave of blood and ruin and confusion went the institution, and there ended that "irrepressible conflict." It ended as I had supposed forever; it has ended forever; but let me warn that Senator that another "irrepressible conflict" has arisen in this country, not between African slavery and freedom, but it is a conflict on the one hand between the people for their liberties, and arrogant, bloated corporate power and monopoly on the other hand. That is another "irrepressible conflict" to which I invite the attention of the Senator. When he said, "How easy it is to shoot labor ground down with a hundred years of slavery," he forgot how labor was shot not more than four years ago at Pittsburgh, at Chicago, and at other places; labor that had never been and never will be "ground down" with slavery. Oh, but the Senator would have us understand that they are only poor white mechanics, a "lawless mob," as another republican Senator styles them, who ought to be shot when they do not obey the behests of corporate powers. They ask you for justice and you give them shot and shell. They ask you for bread and you give them a stone. They ask you for labor and you give them the highway and a kick and tell them to support their wives and children upon tramping and fresh air. Unfortunate allusion of the Senator! In this very morning's paper I see that "irrepressible conflict" still going on—strikes at Milwaukee, strikes in Saint Louis, strikes in other large cities, of the free-born, liberty-loving white men of the North against the aggressive, bloated plutocracy which is seeking to grind them to the dust. That is an "irrepressible conflict."

No, sir, we do not shoot labor at the South, and if the honorable Senator from Maine will go with me I will show him men with the plow handles in their hands, as good and intelligent and as proud as he dare be. The laboring man of the South does not know what hunger, cold, and want are.

The Senator says that we of the South cannot longer "blindfold" the people of the North. We are not seeking to do so. We have never sought to do so. We wish the people of the North had seen and could see the condition of things at the South, and we wish the people of the South could see the real condition of things at the North. We want the light of truth turned on all over this land. And let me say to the Senator in reply, he cannot throw dust in the eyes of the freemen of the North and keep them longer in the dark as to the shortcomings of republican methods and policies by abusing and misrepresenting the South. They are beginning to have eyes to see and ears to hear, and they see and hear, and his "cuttle-fish" tactics had better be abandoned.

I invite the Senator to a little history from his own State. In an editorial in one of the leading papers of Maine of October 31, 1879, I find the following:

> Our laws against bribery are a dead letter. Neither party to the crime can be put on his oath, and conviction is impossible in the present demoralized condition of public sentiment and perversion of judicial machinery. A man in York County was offered $5 to cast a republican ballot. He accepted the money, took the ballot, rolled the money up in it, went before the grand jury and made his statement. A majority of the jury were republicans, who voted to find no bill against the briber. In both State and United States courts it has been found impossible to convict for bribery at elections; and as the law now stands bribery rides rampant over the law.

If my memory serves me, I heard the Senator make some reference to the courts and juries in South Carolina. I commend him to his own State to begin his crusade of reform.

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator give the name of the paper from which he reads?

Mr. BUTLER. Certainly, I will do so with pleasure; it is the Eastern Argus. In the same paper of October 30, 1879, I find the following extracts from the Boston Globe. These papers are respectable and reputable; I presume they are, such at least is my information.

and belief. I am not even advised to what political party they belong. The extract from the Boston Globe is as follows:

The most iniquitous kind of corruption which has been practiced in the State of Maine has been the joint use of the much vaunted morality law against the sale of intoxicating liquors and the power of the courts. In Cumberland and in Kennebec, in Knox and in Androscoggin, in Sagadahoc and in Penobscot—in short, all over the State, liquor sellers of high and low degree, who have until now uniformly voted the democratic ticket—men whose principles, whose selfish pecuniary interests and political policies would all tend to make them democrats, or at least opponents to that party which has kept the prohibitory law in existence, have in large numbers, and in some cities and towns wholly voted the republican ticket. As a reward for this service sentences imposed by the highest courts of the Commonwealth have been mitigated and annulled by the action of the administrative officers connected with the judiciary.

There stands upon the records of county courts to-day sentences imposed but never enforced, both of imprisonment and fine, and evidence equally strong that indictments have been made but quietly shelved and no further action taken on them, laid on file or nolle-prossed.

Intimidation has reached the Church, and an instance of this is found in the case of a man who was a Sunday-school teacher in Androscoggin County. His class was taken away from him for no other reason than that he was a democrat.

The laws of Maine provide, as is usual elsewhere, that paupers shall not vote. And yet in one of the largest cities in the State not only were those allowed to vote who had been furnished with outside aid, but actual inmates of the poor-house were taken to the polls and there made to deposit their ballots—republican ballots; and this is not an isolated case.

In concluding this chapter of the record of the base frauds and corruptions fostered by the dominant party in Maine against popular rights and free government, we have given but a faint general picture of the terrible truth.

I commend to the honorable Senator from Maine that he take that "Bible," that "school-book," upon which he says his "civilization" is founded, and issue a new edition of both, for some, at least, of his own people.

Here is a letter from Rev. Henry A. Wales to D. P. Stubbs, esq., dated Biddeford, Maine, October 21, 1879, in which he says that he was intimidated because he was a greenbacker, and his flock left him, some of them because he chose to exercise the right of an American freeman in thinking politically as he chose. I shall not delay the Senate to read it, but will ask to have it incorporated in my remarks.

Mr. HALE. Who are the signers to the letter?

Mr. BUTLER. It is from Rev. Henry A. Wales to D. P. Stubbs, esq.:

The next morning after my nomination (unexpected to me as though I should now be apprised of the shooting of my father) I received a short note from the chairman of my society committee, himself a leading republican in the city, and a delegate to the convention at Bangor which nominated "Corporal" Davis for governor, asking me to call at the wood-room of the Saco Water Power Company, where his office is, at ten o'clock. I received the note at about 9.30 a. m.; sent word I would be there at eleven, and went. I found there the chairman as aforesaid, and the next man upon the committee, who also is treasurer, (a leading republican and treasurer of the city of Saco.) They endeavored by every argument they could bring to induce and frighten me into appearing in a card in the afternoon paper stating that I declined to accept the nomination which had been tendered me. I chose, however, to stand as a candidate. They then used all their power to defeat me. If I was elected I could not afford to go, and it would simply be an injury to the society and to the city. On Saturday evening I was advertised to speak in city hall, but was attacked very severely with cholera-morbus, and could not stand erect when the time arrived. On Sunday I preached in my accustomed place, (more dead than alive, however.) After the service a large number of the republican members of my society signified to the sexton and collector that they should want their pews no longer, and the Sunday after election a larger number, so that, as the collector informed the treasurer, and the treasurer informed me, more than four hundred dollars' worth of seats were given up as the consequence of my nomination and election on the "greenback" ticket to the Maine Legislature. Since that time some have demanded their seats again; and others have said they did not mean to give up their seats. Others, I think, will come back, for our Sunday evening lectures are the most popular just now of any in the city.

But the ex-mayor, for whom I voted last spring, says that he won't go to church to hear any "greenback orator" preach to him. The chairman of the committee said he would not hear me preach again, but he has probably reconsidered his assertion, for he was at my lecture last Sunday evening, with his wife. At noon the day after my nomination, I was called from my dinner to meet a wealthy man of my society in my sitting-room, who told me that he would never hear any man preach who voted the greenback ticket. He said that I was demeaning myself beyond reparation by accepting the nomination of the greenback and democratic parties, and that nearly one-half of my society would withdraw themselves if I persisted in remaining a candidate.

Another member of my society was as busy as a beaver circulating statements that I had on two or three occasions lied to him concerning my politics, between my nomination and election. He was one of my warmest society friends before election, but has withdrawn all his support, as well as his presence, since the election.

These are only the salient points in the case. But I have not time to write more. If God spares my life I shall attend the session of the Legislature next winter, and I shall do all in my power to unite all the elements of opposition, that next year we may be sure, whatever else may be the issue, to defeat one of the most overbearing, unscrupulous, and corrupt parties that the Almighty ever suffered within the pale of a free nation. I have never preached nor prayed, by word, or gesture, or deed one single word of politics in my pulpit nor among my parishioners. I believe the pulpit was not ordained for that purpose. But my vote is sacred to myself and my God, and while a breath lasts in my body I shall continue to vote as I please, and to accept or decline, as I please, whatever national or State honors my fellow-citizens may accord me.

I will inquire if the honorable Senator from Maine has ever heard of one Jacob E. Stevens, of Auburn, who made affidavit that one Fred. Kimball had offered to give him $5 to vote for Tom Littlefield, the republican candidate; or of C. H. Foster, of Lisbon Centre, who swears that a lawyer in Winthrop offered to give him an appointment as route agent or a clerkship if he would quit the greenback party and vote the republican ticket; or of Moses Abbott, of Lisbon, who makes affidavit that F. W. Kimball offered to bribe him; or of a hard-money democrat who was offered $150 to use his influence and vote for Davis; or that ten men in Lewiston were paid $10 each to vote for Davis; a greenback man in Auburn was offered $5, which he refused, then $10, which he accepted, to vote for the republican nominees; that $25 was offered a farmer and two sons in Brunswick to support Davis, the republican nominee; and that in Lewiston, Augusta, Bangor, and Portland $15 was the price of votes; that in Waldo County men changed their minds within a few days and voted the republican ticket, admitting that they had been paid to do so? If not, I will furnish the Senator with the evidence of it. Has the honorable Senator heard of the route agent from Bangor to Portland having been assessed $42.50 on a salary of $850; or of a country postmaster who, with a salary of $45, was assessed $2.25 as his share of the republican fund; or does he know that five, ten, fifteen, and twenty dollars were paid, and in some instances twenty-five, thirty, and as high as forty-five dollars, were paid for a single vote in close districts in Maine in the election of 1879? If not, I can furnish him the data.

September 27. Has the honorable Senator heard of the postmaster at Hopkinton, New Hampshire, having been assessed $20 to aid the election in Maine? Has he seen and read an extract from the Providence Press which severely rebuked the radical leaders in Maine for their party terrorism, the bulldozing of pensioners, and wholesale purchase of votes by money extorted from office-holders? If not, I will be glad to furnish him a copy.

Mr. ROLLINS. Will the Senator give me the name of the postmaster at Hopkinton, New Hampshire, who was assessed?

Mr. BUTLER. I cannot give the name now, but I will be able to do so. I took this statement down from the affidavit.

Mr. ROLLINS. I should like to have the name of the postmaster in New Hampshire who was assessed $20 for the Maine election.

Mr. BUTLER. If the Senator had the names of all those who have been assessed in his State for political purposes he would have more than he could attend to.

Mr. ROLLINS. The Senator will find that the postmasters of New Hampshire were not assessed to pay for the Maine election.

Mr. BUTLER. As to whether it is true or not the Senator and the affiant must settle; I am not able to say. I will furnish the Senator with the source of my information if he desires it.

Mr. ROLLINS. I desire it.

Mr. BUTLER. I give the names, the places, the circumstances, and the time, which is rather more fair than the honorable Senator did on a previous occasion on this floor.

Has the honorable Senator heard how Booth Bay and Southport were carried by republicans by the shameless use of money? Has he heard the evidence of Mr. Willard Merry, of Mr. Martin E. Beals and of Mr. Thomas Boyd? If he has not I should be pleased to furnish the Senator with their evidence, as it would enlighten him as to the methods in his own State. Or has he heard of the confessions of Mr. E. K. Hall, of Nobleborough, and of Mr. William Herbert, of Bristol Falls?

Has the honorable Senator heard of a petition numerously signed by the citizens of Lewiston to secure the release of one Woods, a liquor dealer who had been prosecuted for a violation of the law, and who were required to vote the republican ticket in order to secure their friend's release? If he has not I can furnish him the names, and more, I can furnish him an affidavit setting forth the names of students of Bates College who were disqualified, and yet were allowed to vote because they voted the republican ticket. Has he heard of the addition of names to the voting list, the voting of non-resident parties; of voting in the name of dead persons? Has he heard of trades-people who said they could make affidavit of intimidation and fraud but were afraid lest they should be socially ostracised and ruined in their business? If not, I can furnish him the names and circumstances.

Has the honorable Senator seen the affidavit of James Randall, of Stetson, who swears that he was offered by James W. Rogers a barrel of flour if he would vote the republican ticket, which affidavit is sustained by that of his wife, Mary Randall, or the affidavit of Asa Folsom, of Stetson, who swears that Winslow Powers offered him a horse if he would vote the republican ticket; that he did vote the republican ticket on that account, but has never yet received the horse?

So I could go on, but I will have these facts published in the RECORD where the Senator can see them for himself. I will give the statement of fifteen or twenty apparently intelligent, respectable men, who say that they were prevented from going to the polls by the republican selectmen and managers of election refusing to clear the platform in order that they might be enabled to deposit their ballots without restraint.

Mr. HALE. I shall be very glad if the Senator will give the names and places of residence of those making these affidavits. I know something about that election, and I want to know what these men are and who they are.

Mr. BUTLER. I will give the names with a great deal of pleasure. I find I have not the names here, but I will furnish them to the Senator. I only made this extract.

Mr. HALE. I recognize some of the names.

Mr. BUTLER. Has the honorable Senator heard of Alexander Grant, of the county of Hancock, that Nelson Jelleson, of Ellsworth, offered him $2 to vote the republican ticket; or of Christopher W. Clough, of Hancock County, who swears that P. Bonzey, James Clough, and Christopher Kincade offered him $5 and "plenty to drink" if he would vote the republican ticket; or of Eben M. Bickford, that he was offered by Jelleson $2 for voting the republican ticket?

Has the honorable Senator seen the statement made by Elbridge D. Linscott, dated Union, October 13, 1879, in which he says that his employer offered him $2 to vote the republican ticket; that he refused at first, whereupon his employer threatened to discharge him, and that rather than lose his place he voted the republican ticket and took the $2?

Has the honorable Senator heard of men by the names of Kerrigan, Desmond, Libbey, and Alexander, of Portland, having been bought to vote the republican ticket? Has he heard of a prominent business firm in the Seventh ward of Portland bulldozing its employés, threatening to discharge them if they voted the greenback or coalition ticket; and of another man by the name of Reddy having been purchased to vote the republican ticket? If he has not I can furnish him the evidence.

Has the honorable Senator heard of a certain overseer in the mill at Shapleigh bulldozing six of his men by telling them he would discharge them if they voted the greenback ticket?

Has the honorable Senator heard of William Emery, district attorney of York County, going before the grand jury of that county with testimony that certain voters had been bought to vote the republican ticket, which testimony was conclusive and uncontradicted, and yet the grand jury by a strict party vote refused to find a true bill against the malefactors?

I want to call the attention of the Senator to the affidavits of Levi Richards, Melvin A. Atkins, H. A. Priest, and John A. Preble, of Kenebec County, setting forth bribery and offers of bribery to vote the republican ticket; and also of the poor man of the town of China who was compelled to vote the republican ticket rather than have his wife and sick mother turned out of his home; and the affidavits of Orison Whitely, W. L. Folsom, William Webster, and Silas Piper, of Penobscot County, detailing instances of bribery, corruption, and intimidation.

I want to invite the attention of the Senator to the affidavits of Algernon A. Hopkins, Robert D. Merrill, Warren Waltz, and George W. Hammond, of Damariscotta, Maine, and as to the election at Nobleborough, in the county of Lincoln, where money, bribery, threats, and intimidation were freely used to force voters to vote the republican ticket.

I presume the Senator has heard of the county of Kittery in Maine. If he has I beg leave to refer him to the affidavit of E. C. Pettigrew (November 17, 1879) in reference to an offer made to pay him a barrel of flour and $5 for his vote.

I refer the honorable Senator to a statement signed by a number of citizens of the town of Lincoln, setting forth the practices of the republican selectmen and managers of election in crowding them and other greenback and democratic voters from the polls and refusing to have the platform cleared in order that they might get up to deposit their ballots freely and without restraint.

Mr. HALE. Is there anything in the paper that the Senator is reading from indicating that the selectmen or managers of elections in the town of Lincoln were republicans?

Mr. BUTLER. My recollection of the statement is that it says they were republicans. That is my recollection.

Mr. HALE. Precisely the contrary is the fact and has been for years. I know all about that.

Mr. BUTLER. I will furnish the entire statement. My own comment is this: They appear to be men of intelligence and respectability, but the Senator has better means for knowing that than I have. I will furnish the names; I did not copy them.

Mr. HALE. I am sorry the Senator has not got them here, because if I am called upon by any of his strictures upon my State to reply the only time I should wish to reply would be at the present time when he sits down, and I should be glad to have the names. Of course if the Senator has not them here I cannot get them.

Mr. BUTLER. I have not them with me. I could get them. I suppose.

I also invite the Senator's attention to the affidavit of Thomas R. Rand, William H. Atwood, James Donovan, N. J. Wedgewood, Moses Abbott, Jason Rand, and Alfred King, as to the republican intimidation, bribery, corruption, and fraud in the county of Androscoggin, State of Maine. December 9, Mr. James Avery, of Somerset, in the State of Maine, made the following affidavit.

Mr. HALE. Let us hear it.

Mr. BUTLER. It is as follows:

I hereby certify and declare that some two months ago I was importuned frequently to join the Davis Club, of Fairfield, and especially urged to do so as I was a soldier, and it might be to my disadvantage if I did not do so. I refused, having always been a democrat. Afterward I learned that my wife had been induced to call on the town for assistance by some of these persons, and the selectmen furnished her $1.50 in goods. I went and paid for the same and got a receipt. I did this believing it was done to deprive me of voting. On the day of the election I offered my vote, and it was refused on the ground that I had received help from the town. I served in the Army, and had an honorable discharge.

Mr. HALE. What is the date of that paper, if the Senator pleases?

Mr. BUTLER. I did not get the date, but I will furnish it; it is about the same time, October, 1879.

Mr. HALE. To what election does it refer?

Mr. BUTLER. To the election of 1879. From the same town is the affidavit of Daniel Butterfield and O. M. Chamberlain, who were threatened with having their pensions cut off if they did not vote the republican ticket.

I presume the Senator has heard of a mob of his political friends refusing to permit Major E. W. French, of the adjutant-general's office of the State of Maine, to remove the State arms from the State arsenal under orders from the governor of the State. If he has forgotten that incident in the history of Maine it will give me great pleasure to furnish a full account of it to refresh his memory. Mob law! Mob violence! Mob rule! in a State where they have a free ballot and a fair count.

Mr. HALE rose.

Mr. BUTLER. I would prefer if the Senator would not interrupt me now.

Mr. HALE. If the Senator will excuse me——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Senators will address the Chair.

Mr. HALE. I did not quite get from the Senator what the instance was that he referred to just now of mob law. He will oblige me very much if he will read that again.

Mr. BUTLER. The instance when Major E. W. French, of the adjutant-general's office, went, it seems, to some arsenal to procure certain arms, and he loaded them in a wagon, and he was prevented by a mob from removing them.

Mr. HALE. I know all about that.

Mr. BUTLER. I am glad of it. I want to invite the honorable Senator's attention to another branch of morals, law, religion, morality, a "free ballot and a fair count," and the progress of civilization in his State. I will read an editorial from the Lewiston Weekly Gazette of Friday, April 15, 1881, to which I invite the honorable Senator's attention, and I wish I had the opportunity of inviting his colleague's attention to it, as I believe that is his home:

Oh, dear! oh, dear! What a high old moral community this is getting to be! Were it the slightest good, we could moralize in a dismaler strain than ever Hamlet did over Yorick's skull. There's a cussedness in this world that runs cross-grain with all the purity, piety, morality, and sobriety of the great moral party, that is simply exasperating. The millenium don't seem to have come after all. Yonder at Week's Mills—

Perhaps the Senator knows where that is; I do not—a man smashes his mother's head with a hatchet, chops her up, tries to burn her limbs in the stove, and don't seem to feel any remorse. Only the other day there was the hideous Chandler case at Minot, disclosing a revolting absence of the commonest decency and moral perception. A short while since a girl of seventeen was found rolling in the mud on Lisbon street—dead drunk, in the pure, correct city of Lewiston. Last week a dead baby was found on a dung-hill on Cedar street, abandoned to be gnawed by rats; and this week another has been found in Auburn. A member of Independent Baptist church at Corinth, "who had his sins washed away four years ago," has just absconded with his step-daughter, leaving two or three wives and a number of children to mourn the pious one's absence. Only on Wednesday two brothers, theological students at Lawrence, in the neighboring State of Massachusetts, went burglaring, and one of them was shot dead and the other one confesses to a course of previous robberies.

I see my friend, the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] pricks up his ears when that is mentioned.

Every paper contains news of some new outrage in our midst. We could pile instance on instance, did multiplying horrors effect any good, but why add to the sickening list? While the church bells are ringing, and good people wending their way up the aisles; while parsons in shoals are exhorting their flocks; while strict prohibition laws are in full force; while crowds of busybodies flutter around us, who think their special mission is to look after other folks' souls; while all these beneficent agencies are at work we say, drunkenness and gambling, immorality and thievery, adultery and incest, murder, infanticide, and matricide spring up among us as rapidly as fungi in a dark, loathsome cave, making thinking men shudder while the fools dance on.

This is no fancy picture, purposely drawn in dark colors, but a bare statement of facts held to the light. Did we but grasp these realities fully and view them truly, all this congratulatory hand-shaking, this self-satisfied adulation, this fatuous complacency that seems to prevail among us would give way to pale fear as men asked each other what shall we do? Whither are we drifting?

Did our lawgivers give less time to securing fat sinecures for themselves and their cat's-paws, and more to the weighty responsibilities of their offices, we should see a strong, wise legislation that would foster virtue and truth and reduce to a minimum all mean things; we should behold the church casting off the robes of sanctimoniousness that some of its priests draw around it with so lofty an air as to frighten away all timid wretches that cannot see the beauty behind and drive them down deeper into the slough surrounding them, to grapple manfully with this demon of crime and of foulness that seems omnipresent; we should have a religion that believed more in saving the poor, the miserable, the wicked, and, contenting itself less with pretty lectures, and frantic revivals, tepid tea-meetings, and all that sort of pious frivolity, would meet the foe face to face. Not that the fault rests with the clergy. Instead of men holding aloof and expecting the church to look after all humanity's morality, did they seize the sense of the never-ending train of crimes, they would join hand in hand with the professed saviors and strain every sinew; work might and main like heroes; rest not, but toil unceasingly to wash out this stain of crime, which is spreading further and further, blackening the fair fame of this State of ours; to alleviate the misery, sin, and wretchedness abounding everywhere around us. Were this matter viewed through other than the rose-colored spectacles we persist in donning, we should meet men of all grades working silently and in unison, with a grim doggedness to save this dear New England, that we love and reverence, from the sin and sorrow rampant in it.

But, bah! what's the use of moralizing. Things ran crooked ever since the days of Ptolemy Philadelphus, and before that.

Now, I want to read to the Senator a slight supplement in the form of a private letter which I received from a gentleman of Boston, Massachusetts, whose name I shall withhold:

BOSTON, April 21, 1881.

DEAR SIR: I mail herewith a copy of the Lewiston Gazette, published at the home of Hon. WILLIAM P. FRYE. I call your attention to an article under the heading, "Maine To-Day," which I have marked. I will add some additional facts as to cases therein referred to.

Hon. M. C. BUTLER.

"Week's Mills" is a post-office in the town of China, Kennebec County, ten miles from Augusta. The murderer, Merrill, is in jail in Augusta. It was two or three days before the murder of his mother was discovered. He killed her in the barn in the evening. Tried during that night and the next day to burn the remains in the cook-stove, after cutting them up into pieces with his hatchet. The second day he took the trunk and other pieces on a horse-sled (secreted under potatoes he carried to Augusta and sold) and buried them in the snow in a piece of woods on the way. Pieces of her fingers which he had chopped up were afterward found in the road, having rattled out of the potatoes as he drove along. When arrested he confessed the facts.

The facts in the Chandler case cited are these:

Out of deference to this presence, out of common decency, I shall decline to read the revolting recital therein set forth. I will only characterize it by saying that in heinousness, in brutality, in beastliness, it has never been equaled since the deeds of the Borgias shocked humanity by the cruelty that characterized them. If there was a beast in human form in my own State that could perpetrate a crime of revolting cruelty like this, I would invoke the curses of God Almighty upon it to blast and consume it with everlasting fire. The school-book and the Bible the foundation of such a civilization! God help the school-book and the Bible if such lessons should be learned from them. But Satan had more to do with such atrocities than the Bible and the school-book, and the Senator should not desecrate them by "founding" such a "civilization" upon them.

Mr. President, it gives me no pleasure to cite these instances of crime. I do not cite them to discount anything that may be wrong in South Carolina. Far be it from me to arraign the people of Maine or of New England; far be it from me to say one word against the gallant people of that section of this great Union. They have their troubles and trials. They have great and good men and women who wish "peace on earth, good-will toward men." So have we of the South. They have their bad men and women, and criminals, and so have we. I do it, however, to remind that Senator that before he begins another crusade into South Carolina for the purpose of reforming us and our morals, he should apply the teachings of the school-book and the Bible to his own home and to his own town, and that it is not always safe for a man who lives in a glass house of such thin dimensions to be casting stones at others.

I have another editorial, headed "Murder," from the Eastern Argus of September 29, 1879, as follows:

Another horrible murder in this vicinity, all the known facts in regard to which are given in another column, shocks the community and leads thoughtful persons to inquire, what does the alarming increase of murders mean? Has human life become less sacred, that it is hopelessly at the mercy of every worthless brute who covets a few dollars? Has Maine's regard for the sacredness of the lives of the murderers made this State the favorite stamping ground of murderers from other States? Or has the moral sense and manhood of her own people deteriorated under and in spite of her boasted educational advantages and reformatory laws?

These are pertinent questions, and they are important ones. The records of our courts and the swelling numbers of criminals in prison, with a stationary or decreasing population—

Here I may say that I believe the population of Maine increased in ten years only 3 per cent. Down in that "barbarism" in the South where I live, so repressive of progress and independence, civilization, and character, as the Senator would have us believe, we have increased forty-one per cent., but in "the God and morality" community, where the Senator lives, the increase has been but three per cent.—

tell a story of the increase of crime very sad, not to say alarming, to contemplate, and which painfully suggests that there must be something wrong in our education, or in our dealing with criminals, or perhaps in both.

We may be unduly moved by the frequent repetitions of bloody tragedies which we have been called upon to record, but unless we are, there is imperative demand upon philanthropy and statsmanship to study the causes of the undoubted and alarming increase of heinous crimes and to seek out and apply remedies to arrest that increase.

This, Mr. President, is no language of mine. I do not bring it here, except from the records of your own newspapers, and I commend them to the Senator before he goes off away down South and undertakes to read us lectures on reform and morality and religion. We have difficulties enough of our own—too many crimes, entirely too many crimes—all over the South as well as at the North. I do not think it is becoming in the honorable Senator, if he will pardon me for saying so without disrespect, that he should signalize his entry into this Chamber by a tirade of abuse and misrepresentation upon one great section of this great country.

The Senator appeared to be very fond of reminding the "rebel brigadiers" that they had been conquered. It is true; we have never denied it; we were conquered; but if the Senator from Maine had any particular hand in that little operation I never heard of it; if he had any hand in that conquering it was with a projectile that fired and killed at a longer range than any I ever heard of. Conquered us! Oh, how startling; how terrible it was to see the Senator draw his sword fifteen years after everybody else had sheathed theirs! With glaring eyes, distended nostrils, outstretched arms, and voice trembling with rage, he was charging upon the lamb-like rebel brigadiers as they sat on the lower side of the stream. I was reminded, if I can say so without disrespect, of that valiant knight of Quixotic memory on his Rosinante, charging a flock of sheep or other imaginary enemy. Oh, Mr. President, how the Senator did conquer us! How Maine rewards her soldiers—soldiers in peace and bombproofs in war!

I will read an extract from a speech of one, I believe, of the most distinguished soldiers who led the Union Army during the war, from Maine, General Chamberlain. Perhaps some of the republican Senators have heard of him. I have. Here is what he said in a speech delivered at Boothbay, Maine, on the occasion of the unveiling of the soldiers' monument:

There is, perhaps, a natural antagonism between politicians and soldiers. Often the politicians make the wars and the soldiers end them. The soldiers win the fight and the politicians want the profits. The wranglers after the spoils are louder than the wrestlers for the cause. Men who freely poured out their heart's blood for their convictions, though wrong, are less to be feared than they who skulk in the rear and gloat over the strife so long as they can fill their pockets with plunder, snatched alike from foe or friend.

There is the language of a man who was in at the conquering. He was there, and I thought, Mr. President, that I had heard that my distinguished friend from Rhode Island [Mr. BURNSIDE] was in at that conquering, when he led so gallantly that splendid corps of American soldiers, the Ninth Corps, and who also led that splendid Army of the Potomac. I thought he was there. I thought the honorable Senator from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN,] at the head of the Fifteenth Corps and the Army of the Tennessee, that invincible body of American soldiery, was there. I thought that I had seen the bright saber of the knightly Custer flash out in my front upon the crest of battle as he came charging down at the head of his gallant Michiganders. I will read now an extract from a private letter of this dashing hero to a "rebel brigadier," Fitz Lee, and see when he thought hostilities had ended. It is worthy of his generous heart and patriotic courage:

WASHINGTON, April 17, 1876.

MY DEAR GENERAL: * * * I have no doubt we could entertain each other in the happiest and most interesting manner, by relating incidents of skirmishes, battles, and raids in which we were both engaged, although upon opposite sides. You were my instructor in cavalry at West Point, a sufficient cause for me to cherish pleasant recollections of you, but I have a more recent as well as enduring cause to feel the warmest interest in you; and that is, we contended with each other in battle, and I need not remind you that when men have exchanged cannon-balls or crossed sabers with each other a fellowship is founded the strength and sincerity of which is almost beyond estimate. From the moment the last gun was fired and the war was ended, I sheathed my sword, and in doing so buried every spark of animosity or bitter feeling indulged in during the days of actual conflict.

I rejoice to learn from mutual friends of your success in following the arts of peace; as you were gallant in war I trust you may be fortunate in peace. My limited stay here will debar me the pleasure of a visit to you; I hope, however, this is only a pleasure deferred. I expect to leave this city for the plains during the present week. My address is Fort Lincoln, Dakota, where I will always be glad to see or hear from you.

* * * * * * *

G. A. CUSTER.

General FITZ HUGH LEE.

I thought I had seen the compact squadron of the fearless Merritt as he too came moving like a wall of adamant in our front. I thought I had heard of the wiry form of the dashing Kilpatrick in the pine lands of the South leading his fierce squadron to the onset. I thought that that greatest of American soldiers now living, Grant, was there. I thought that the restless Sherman, with his impetuous ardor, was there, and McClellan, one of the most accomplished soldiers of his day. I thought Slocum, Wright, Parke, Humphreys, and Gregg and Torbert, and Sheridan, (about whom it was said he could come nearer locating the strength of his enemy by the fire of the musketry than any man in the American Army,) and Randal McKenzie were there, and that Gillmore and McPherson and the dauntless, chivalric Hancock, ("the noblest Roman of them all,") with that splendid Second Corps, whom Grant always selected to detail for our lines when he wanted a dangerous place carried or a difficult movement executed, were there. But I believe, Mr. President, that I have been laboring under a delusion—in a dream. It was the Senator from Maine, [Mr. FRYE.] [Laughter.] He led the cohorts of the Union against the "rebellion" and "conquered" it; and, oh, Mr. President, how I beg his pardon for the great injustice that I have done him, and I am afraid history has done him, when I supposed that any of the brave American soldiers who had felt our steel and whose steel we had felt, each admitting that they were foemen worthy of the steel of the other, when I supposed that perhaps some of these names were there; but I am sure after the speech which I heard in the Senate from the Senator from Maine, who talked about "conquering" us, I was wrong. You never hear those soldiers talk about it. The soldiers in war and the peaceable men in peace never talk about conquering each other. It is only those who were in bomb-proofs who charge upon the unfortunate "rebel brigadiers" with a sort of wolverine ferocity when they are on the lower side of the stream, and not muddying the water. I wonder how the honorable Senator from Virginia [Mr. MAHONE] relished that onslaught of the Senator from Maine upon that civilization which he represents in this body when he said it was "barbarian." I hardly think, knowing how gallantly he led that light division of his on the lines around Petersburgh, that it was very pleasing to him.

But, Mr. President, I do not believe that the Senator from Maine properly represents the feeling of the thinking men of New England. Far be it from me to arraign New England, as I said. I have New England blood in my veins, and I am proud of it, and I should be less than a man if I could say one word that would reflect upon the high character of the true men and women of New England. Too many of those people are carrying their money South to invest in the inviting fields for investment to believe that that civilization is barbaric; too much of the capital of New England is going down there to develop the endless water-powers of that beautiful land and is being kindly and courteously received by the people of that section to believe the tirade which the Senator has seen fit to utter against us.

Mr. President, something has been said, notably by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] that the majority in this Chamber and all other deliberative bodies have the right, as I understood him, the inherent, unqualified right, to rule. Why, sir, this is not a government of majorities; this is not a government of a majority rule, any more than it is a government of one-man power. It is a government guided and controlled by a written constitution, a government of minorities as well as of majorities.

But, says the Senator from Ohio, you ought to let us go on and pass this resolution and "then denounce us" if it is wrong. That was his proposition. That is the way minorities should behave themselves, he says; "permit us to pass the resolution, whether it is righteous or unrighteous, holy or wrong, and then denounce us!" Oh, no, Mr. President, that is not the doctrine for a constitutional government. It might be true of an absolutism. You may as well tell me that after the serpent has struck its fangs in your flesh, discharged the poisonous venom, and withdrawn the fangs, the danger to the victim is over. Why, sir, the danger begins when the fang is withdrawn. The poison is left, producing drowsiness, then convulsions, then death. So with the poison of wrong and fraud when once distilled and thrown into the blood of the body-politic. It leaves it there, first like an opiate to drown the sensibilities and paralyze the watchfulness of the people, make them drowsy, and then produce convulsion and death. No, sir, the way, with all deference to the opinions of that distinguished Senator, to prevent the poison of the serpent is to scotch it before it has gotten its fangs into your flesh.

So it is with the Constitution. Every time we camp outside of it, as our republican friends admit they have done, we shake the great structure from turret to base, and weaken the foundation upon which the great edifice of liberty is built.

No, Mr. President, if there is any form in which the destruction of liberty is more dangerous than another, it is when insidious, invisible, unseen; destruction by the bribery of the people, whether that bribery is in coin or whether it is used in the State of Virginia in the form of Federal patronage. It is dangerous, absolutely destructive, and I cannot give my consent to permit it, if I can prevent it. Senators talk about the movement of the Senator from Virginia being an "entering-wedge" to dissolve "the solid South." If this arrangement succeeds, it will be an entering-wedge to destroy the liberties of the people. It is dallying with dishonor and bartering with cupidity.

Mr. President, I do not know that I can better conclude the remarks with which I have vexed the patience of the Senate very much longer than I expected than by reading an extract from one of the greatest commentators upon the American Constitution, Mr. Justice Story. He says:

> The structure and organization of the several branches composing the Legislature have also (unless my judgment has misled me) been shown by the past review to be admirably adapted to preserve a wholesome and upright exercise of their powers. All the checks which human ingenuity has been able to devise, (at least all which, with reference to our habits, institutions, and local interests, seemed practicable or desirable,) to give perfect operation to the machinery of government; to adjust all its movements; to prevent its eccentricities, and to balance its forces—all these have been introduced with singular skill, ingenuity, and wisdom into the structure of the Constitution.
> Yet, after all, the fabric may fall; for the work of man is perishable and must forever have inherent elements of decay. Nay, it must perish, if there be not that vital spirit in the people which alone can nourish, sustain, and direct all its movements. It is in vain that statesmen shall form plans of government in which the beauty and harmony of a republic shall be embodied in visible order, shall be built up on solid substructions, and adorned by every useful ornament, if the inhabitants suffer the silent power of time to dilapidate its walls or crumble its massy supporters into dust; if the assaults from without are never resisted, and the rottenness and mining from within are never guarded against. Who can preserve the rights and liberties of the people when they shall be abandoned by themselves? Who shall keep watch in the temple when the watchmen sleep at their posts? Who shall call upon the people to redeem their possessions and revive the republic when their own hands have deliberately and corruptly surrendered them to the oppressor, and have built the prisons or dug the graves of their own friends? Aristotle, in ancient times, upon a large survey of the republics of former days and of the facile manner in which they had been made the instruments of their own destruction, felt himself compelled to the melancholy reflection, which has been painfully repeated by one of the greatest statesmen of modern times, that a democracy has many striking points of resemblance with a tyranny. "The ethical character," says Edmund Burke, "is the same; both exercise despotism over the better class of citizens, and the decrees are in the one what ordinances and arrêts are in the other. The demagogue, too, and the court favorite are not unfrequently the same identical men, and always bear a close analogy. And these have the principal power, each in their respective governments, favorites with the absolute monarch and demagogues with the people, such as I have described."
> This dark picture, it is to be hoped, will never be applicable to the Republic of America. And yet it affords a warning, which, like all the lessons of past experience, we are not permitted to disregard. America, free, happy, and enlightened, as she is, must rest the preservation of her rights and liberties upon the virtue, independence, justice, and sagacity of the people. If either fail, the Republic is gone. Its shadow may remain with all the pomp and circumstance and trickery of government, but its vital power will have departed. In America the demagogue may arise as well as elsewhere. He is the natural, though spurious, growth of republics, and like the courtier he may by his blandishments delude the ears and blind the eyes of the people to their own destruction. If ever the day shall arrive in which the best talents and the best virtues shall be driven from office by intrigue or corruption, by the ostracism of the press, or the still more unrelenting persecution of party, legislation will cease to be national. It will be wise by accident and bad by system.

These profound reflections may be fitly supplemented by the language of another great intellect, who saw through many of the delicate intricacies of republican system with the vision of genius and grasped the complicated machinery in its minutest details, the relation of the parts to each other and to the whole.

Mr. Calhoun said in his celebrated letter to Mr. William Smith on the Rhode Island controversy in 1843:

> Constitutions stand to governments as laws do to individuals. As the object of laws is to regulate and restrain the actions of individuals, so as to prevent one from oppressing or doing violence to another, so, in like manner, that of constitutions is to regulate and restrain the actions of governments, so that those who exercise its powers shall not oppress or do violence to the rest of the community.
> Without laws there would be universal anarchy and violence in the community; and without constitutions unlimited despotism and oppression. This is true, be the form of government what it may. If the government of one man, or that of a few, would abuse its authority if not restrained, as is admitted, there is no reason why that of the many would not do the same if not also restrained. If in a community of one hundred persons forty-nine cannot be trusted with unlimited power over fifty-one, on what principle can fifty-one be trusted with unlimited power over forty-nine? If unrestrained the one will abuse its powers, why will not the other also? Can the transfer of a single individual from the side of the fifty-one to that of the forty-nine have the magic effect of reversing the character of the two, and making that unsafe which before was trustworthy?
> The truth is the government of the uncontrolled numerical majority is but the absolute and despotic form of popular governments, just as that of the uncontrolled will of one man, or a few, is of monarchy or aristocracy; and it has, to say the least, as strong a tendency to oppression and the abuse of its powers as either of the others. Hence it is that it would be the death blow of constitutional democracy to admit the right of the numerical majority to alter or abolish constitutions at pleasure, regardless of the consent of the government, or the forms prescribed for their amendment. It would be to admit that it had the right to set aside, at pleasure, that which was intended to restrain it, and which would make it just no restraint at all; and this would be, to attribute to the simple numerical majority an inherent, absolute, and paramount power, derived, not from agreement, compact, or constitution, either expressed or implied, but a higher source. It would be, in short, to attribute to it the same divine right to govern which Sir Robert Filmer claimed for kings, and against which Locke and Sydney so successfully combated. The argument, in both cases, is drawn from the same source, and leads to the same consequence. Admit political power to be inherent, it matters not whether in a dynasty or in a numerical majority, and the consequence is inevitable that it is absolute, and cannot be subject to constitutional restraints. It is only on the opposite theory, that all political rights are derived from assent or compact, expressed or implied, and are conventional, that government, be its form what it may, can be subject to constitutional restraints; and it is, accordingly, to this source that Locke, Sydney, and other writers on the side of liberty, traced them. Fortunately for us, their doctrines became the creed of our ancestors, and the foundation of our free, popular, and glorious system of government, in which laws derive their authority from constitutions, and these from the free and united assent of the whole community, given expressly, or by a cheerful acquiescence.

I believe, Mr. President, it will never be found in the history of the republics of the past that one of them has perished from outside influences. It is internal corruption; it is lulling the people, the bed-rock upon which all republics are based, into a dangerous acquiescence, delusive sense of security, by just such methods as those that I have adverted to in this debate to-day as prevailing in certain parts of this Union; it is the insidious, destroying, blasting influence of corruption and corruption funds, the improper use of money, that take the life of republics and destroys liberty. This dangerous influence of money and the money power exerts itself in various ways. It was notably made manifest at our last session of Congress when we, as the representatives of the States and great body of the people, passed a funding bill in their interest to reduce their expenses. The corporations, interfering and threatening, came at the doors of Congress and at the doors of the White House, and there proved efficacious in defeating it. I tell the Senator from Maine when he talks about the open violence and flagrant violations of law in the South, (which I insist are greatly exaggerated,) they may be dangerous, but not so dangerous to the liberties of this country as the secret and corrupt use of money and the arrogance of overgrown corporate power. The one corrects itself, as the people, the great body of intelligent people of this country, rise and make themselves felt; it is something tangible at which they can strike; but in the other, unfortunately for liberty, the people never discover it until the poison has been instilled and liberty has gone.

[APPENDIX.

Hon. Jeremiah S. Black to Hon. James A. Garfield.

SIR: I have read the speech you sent me. I am astonished and shocked. As the leader of your party, to whom the candidates have specially delegated the conduct of the campaign, you should have met your responsibilities in a very different way. I do not presume to lecture so distinguished a man upon his errors; but if I can prevent you, even to a small extent, from abusing the public credulity, it is my duty to try. Premising only my great anxiety to preserve the fraternal relations existing between us for many years, I follow the Horatian rule, and come at once to the "middle of things."

You trace back the original of present parties to the earliest immigrations at Plymouth and Jamestown, and profess to find in the opposing doctrines then planted, and afterward constantly cherished in Massachusetts and Virginia, the germs of the ideas which now make democracy and abolitionism the deadly foes of each other. The ideas so planted in Massachusetts were, according to your account, the freedom and equality of all races, and the right and duty of every man to exercise his private judgment in politics as well as religion. On the other hand, you set forth as irreconcilably hostile the doctrines of Virginia, "that capital shall own labor; that the negro had no rights of manhood, and that the white man might buy, own, and sell him and his offspring forever." Following these assertions with others, and linking the present with the long past, you employ the devices of your rhetoric to glorify the modern abolitionist and to throw foul scorn, not merely on the southern people, but on the whole democracy of the country.

This looks learned and philosophical, and gives your speech a dignity seemingly above the reach of the ordinary demagogue. Happy is he who knows the causes of things; felicitous is the partisan member of Congress whose stump-speech goes up the river of time to the first fountains of good and evil. But your contrast of historical facts is open to one objection, which I give you in a form as simple as possible, when I say that it is wholly destitute of truth. This, of course, implies no imputation on your good faith. Your high character in the church, as well as the State, forbids the belief that you would be guilty of willful misrepresentation. The men of Massachusetts, so far from planting the right of private judgment, extirpated and utterly extinguished it, by means so cruel that no man of common humanity can think of them even now without disgust and indignation. I am surprised to find you ignorant of this. Did you never hear of the frightful persecutions they carried on systematically against Baptists, Quakers, and Catholics? How they fined, imprisoned, lashed, mutilated, enslaved, and banished everybody that claimed the right of free thought? How they stripped the most virtuous and inoffensive women, and publicly whipped them on their naked backs, only for expressing their conscientious convictions? Have you never, in all your reading, met with the story of Roger Williams? For merely suggesting to the public authorities of the colony that no person ought to be punished on account of his honest convictions, he was driven into the woods and pursued ever afterward with a ferocity that put his life and that of his friends in constant danger. In fact, the cruelty of their laws against the freedom of conscience, and the unfeeling rigor with which they were executed, made Massachusetts odious throughout the world.

These great crimes of the Pilgrim Fathers ought not to be cast up to their children, for some of their descendants (I hope a good majority) are high-principled and honest men, sincerely attached to the liberal institutions planted in the more southern latitudes of the continent. But if you are right in your assertion that the abolitionists derive their principles from the ideas entertained and planted at Plymouth, that may account for the coarse and brutal tyranny with which your party has, in recent times, trampled upon the rights of free thought and free speech.

Nor are you more accurate in your declaration that the old Yankees planted the doctrine of freedom and equality, or opposed the domination of one race over another. Messrs. Palfrey and Sumner have said something to the effect that slavery never existed in Massachusetts, and you may have been misled by them. But they were either wholly ignorant of the subject, or else spoke with that loose and lavish unveracity which is a common fault among men of their political sect.

The Plymouth colony and the province of Massachusetts Bay were pro-slavery to the backbone. If you doubt this, I refer you to Moore's "History of Slavery in Massachusetts," where the evidence (consisting chiefly of records and documents perfectly authenticated) is produced and collated with a fullness and fairness which cannot be questioned. The Plymouth immigrants planted precisely the doctrine which you ascribe to the Jamestown colonists; that is to say, they held that "the negro had no rights of manhood; that the white man might buy, own, and sell him and his offspring forever." Practically and theoretically they maintained that human slavery in its most malignant form was a perfectly just, proper, and desirable institution, entirely consistent with Christianity, as they understood it, and founded on principles of universal jurisprudence. They insisted upon it as an established and settled rule of the law of nations that when one government or community or political organization made war upon its subjects or the subjects of another and vanquished them, the people of the beaten party had no rights to which the right of the conquerer was not paramount. Whenever it was demonstrated, by actual experiment, that any people were too weak to defend their homes and families against an invader who visited them with fire and sword, they might lawfully be stripped of their property, and they themselves, their wives and children, justly be held as slaves, or sold into perpetual bondage. That was the idea they planted in their own soil, propagated among their contemporaries, and transmitted to the abolition party of the present day. You have preached and practiced it in all your dealings in the South. This absolute domination is what you mean, if you mean anything, when you talk about the "precious results of the war." If the doctrine thus planted by the original settlers in Massachusetts be true, and if the "precious fruits" of it, which you are gathering with so much industry, be legitimate, it is a perfect justification of all the slavery that ever existed in this country. Your great exemplars, from whom you acknowledge that you have derived your ideas of freedom, certainly thought or professed to think so, and they carried it out to its logical consequences. When an African potentate chose to fight with and subdue a weak tribe, inside or out of his dominion, he sold the prisoners whom he did not think proper to kill, and the men of Massachusetts bought them without a question of his title. They kept them and worked them to death, or sold them again as their interest prompted, for they held that the right of domination, resulting from the application of brute force, was good in the hands of all subsequent purchasers, however remote from the original conquisitor.

They executed this theory to the fullest extent in their own wars with the Indians. Without cause or provocation, and without notice or warning, they fell upon the Pequods, massacred many of them, and made slaves of the survivors, without distinction of age or sex. About seven hundred, including many women and children, were sent to the West Indies and there sold on public account, the proceeds being put in the colonial treasury. Eight score of these unfortunate people escaped from the butchery by flight, and afterward gave themselves up on the solemn promise of the authorities that they should neither be put to death nor enslaved. The promise was broken with as little remorse as a modern abolitionist would violate his oath to support the Constitution. The "precious results of the war" were not to be lost by an honest observance of their pledged faith, and the victims of this infamous treachery were all of them shipped to the Barbadoes, and sold or "swapped for Blackamoors." This practice of enslaving their captives was uniform, covered all cases, including women and children, as well as fighting men. When death put King Philip beyond their reach, they sent his wife and child with the rest to be sold into slavery. The Indians made bad slaves. They were hard to tame, they escaped into the forest, and had to be hunted down, brought back and branded. They never ceased to be sullen and disobedient. The Africans always, on the contrary, "accepted the situation," were easily domesticated, and bore the yoke without murmuring. For that reason it became a settled rule of public and private economy in Massachusetts to exchange worthless Indians for valuable negroes, cheating their West India customers in every trade. Perhaps it was here that your party got the germ of its honesty as well as its humanity. They made war for no other object than to supply themselves with subjects for this fraudulent traffic. In 1643 Emanuel Downing, the foremost lawyer in the colony, and a leader of commanding influence, as well as high connections, made a written argument in favor of a war with the Narragansetts. He did not pretend that any wrong had been done but he had a pious dread that Massachusetts would be held responsible for the false religion of the Narragansetts. "I doubt," says he, "if it be not synne in us, having power in our hands, to suffer them to mayntayne the worship of the evil, which their pow-wows often doe." This tenderness of conscience for the sins of the people is very characteristic of the party which got the "germ of its ideas" from that source. But we go a little further, and you will see with pleasure how exactly you have copied their doctrines. "If," says he, "upon a just war, the Lord should deliver them into our hand, we might easily have men, women, and children to exchange for Moors, (negroes,) which will be more gayneful pilladge for us than wee conceive, for I do not see how we can thrive until we get into a stock of slaves sufficient to do all our business." This (except the spelling) might come from an abolitionist caucus to-day. You will find Downing's letter in Moore, page 10.

They did get most of their Indians off, and supplied themselves with negroes in their places. The shameless inhumanity with which the blacks were used made slavery in Massachusetts "the sum of all villainy." In the letter of Downing, already referred to, he says: "You know very well wo shall mayntayne twenty Moores cheaper than one English servant." Think of reducing a West India negro in that intensely cold climate to the one-twentieth part of the food and clothing which a white menial was in the habit of getting. They must have been frozen and starved to death in great numbers. When that happened it was but the loss of an animal. The harboring of a slave woman was, in 1646, pronounced by the highest authority to be the same injury as the unlawful detention of a beast. In 1716, Sewell, the chief justice of the colony, said that negroes were rated with horses and hogs. Dr. Belknap tells us that afterward, when the stock enlarged and the market became dull, young negroes and mulattoes were sometimes given away like puppies. This is the kind of freedom, this the equality of the races, which you learned from the ancient colonists.

But they taught you more than that. Their precept and example established the slavery of white persons as well as Indians and negroes. As their remorseless tyranny spared no age and no sex, so it made no distinction of color. Besides the cargoes of white heretics which were captured and shipped to them by their brethren in England, they took special delight in fastening their yoke on all who were suspected of heterodoxy. One instance is worthy of special attention. Lawrence Southwick and his wife were Quakers, and accused at the same time with many others of attending Quaker meeting, or "ayding with Quakers" and "absenting themselves from the public ordinances." The Southwicks had previously suffered so much in their persons and estates from this kind of persecution that they could no longer work or pay more fines, and, therefore, the general court, by solemn resolution, ordered them to be banished on pain of death. Banishment, you will not fail to notice, was in itself equivalent to a lingering death, if the parties were poor and feeble; for it meant merely driving them into the wilderness to starve with hunger and cold. Southwick and his wife went out and died very soon. But this is not all. This unfortunate pair had two children—a boy and girl—(Daniel and Provided,) who, having healthy constitutions, would bring a good price in the slave market. The children were taken from the parents and ordered to be sold in the West Indies. It happened, however, that there was not a shipmaster in any port of the colony who would consent to become the agent of their transportation and sale. The authorities being thus balked in their views of the main chance, were fain to be satisfied in another way; they ordered the girl to be whipped; she was lashed accordingly, in company with several other Quaker ladies, and then committed to prison, to be further proceeded against. History loses sight of her there. No record shows whether they killed her or not.

This is one case out of a great many. It is very interesting and instructive when taken in connection with your speech, for it shows the "germ of the idea" which your party acted on when it kidnapped and imprisoned men and women by the thousands for believing in American liberty as guaranteed by the Constitution. The Quakers and Baptists had no printed organ in that day through which their private judgment could be expressed, else you would no doubt have cases directly in point to justify your forcible suppression of two hundred and fifty newspapers.

Enmity to the right of private judgment comes down to the party of Plymouth ideas by consistent and regular succession. It is woven like a dirty stripe into the whole warp and woof of their history. As soon as they got possession of the Federal Government under John Adams they began to use it as an engine for the suppression of free thought. Their alien law gave the President power to banish or imprison, without trial, any foreigner whose opinions might be obnoxious to his supporters. Their sedition law put every democratic speaker and writer under the heel of the Administration. Their standing army was used, as it now is, to crush out their political opponents. If you come into Eastern Pennsylvania, and particularly into the good county of Berks, you will learn that the people there still think with indignation of that old reign of terror when Federal dragoons kidnapped, insulted, and beat their fathers, chopped down their "liberty poles," broke to pieces the press of the Reading Eagle, and whipped its venerated editor in the market-house. The same spirit broke out again in the burning of nunneries and churches under Maria Monk, and under John Brown the whole country swarmed with spies and kidnappers. When you abandoned the harlot and rallied to the standard of the thief, you changed your leader without changing your principles.

The slave code planted in Massachusetts was the earliest in America and the most cruel in all its provisions. It was pertinaciously adhered to for generations, and never repented of, or formally repealed. It was gradually abandoned, not because it was wrong, but solely because it was found, after long experiment, to be unprofitable. The plan of keeping twenty negroes as cheaply as one white servant did not work well, for in that climate a negro thus used would infallibly die before his labor paid what he cost. They sold their stock whenever they could, but emancipation was forbidden by law, unless the owner gave security to maintain the slave, and prevent him from becoming a public charge. To evade this law, those who had old or infirm negroes encouraged them to bring suit for their freedom, and then by sham demurrers, or other collusive arrangements, got judgments against themselves that the negroes were free and always had been. Females likely to increase the stock, were advertised to be sold "for that fault alone." Young ones, because they were not worth raising, were given away like puppies of a superabundant litter. In this way domestic slavery by degrees got loose in practice, simply because it would not pay—but the principle on which one man may own another whom he subdues by superior strength or cunning was never abandoned, repudiated, or denied. That principle was cherished, preserved, and transmitted to you, their imitative and loving disciples, and you have applied it wherever you could as tyrannically as they did.

You say that "war without an idea is simply brutality." I submit to your judgment, as a Christian man, whether war is redeemed of its brutality by such ideas as you and your political associates entertain of its purposes, objects, and consequences. In all your acts and measures, and by all your speeches and discussions, you express the idea that the logic of blows proves everything you choose to assert; that a successful invasion of one people by another has the effect of destroying all natural right to, and all the legal guarantees for the life, liberty, and property of the people so invaded and conquered; that after a trial by battle the victor may enter up and execute what judgment he pleases against his adversary; that the crime which a weak community are guilty of when they attempt to defend their lives, their property, and their families against invaders who come upon them to kill, destroy, and subjugate them is so unpardonable that the whole body of the offenders, taken collectively, and all individuals who partake even passively of the sin, may justly be devoted to death or such other punishment, by wholesale or retail, as the strong party may see proper to inflict; that the conqueror, after the war is over, may insist that the helpless and unarmed people whom he has prostrated shall assist him by not merely accepting, but "adopting" (I use your own word) the measures intended to degrade and rob them, and thus make himself master of their souls as well as their bodies. All rights of men are resolved by this theory into the mights of men.

I aver that this doctrine, in all its length and breadth, is false and pernicious. It is the foundation on which all slavery rests, and the excuses for all forms of tyranny. It has no support in any sound rule of public law, and has never been acknowledged by wise or virtuous governments in any age since the advent of Christ. You can find no authority for it, except in the examples of men whose names are given over to universal execration. Mohammed asserted it when he forced his religion upon the subjugated East, when churches were violently converted into mosques, and the emblem of Christianity was trampled under foot to be replaced by the badge of the impostor. On the same principle Poland was partitioned, and Ireland plundered a dozen times. The king of Dahomey acted upon it when he sold his captives, and the people of Massachusetts indorsed it when they took them in exchange for captives of their own. You and your confreres adopted it as a part of your political creed when, after the southern people were thoroughly subdued, you denied them all the rights of freemen, tore up their society, abrogated all laws which could protect them in person or property, broke their local governments to pieces, and put them under the domination of notorious thieves, whom you forced them to accept as their absolute masters.

These results of the war are no doubt very precious. The right to traffic in the flesh of Indians and negroes was precious to the Yankees and the king of Dahomey. That was the fruit of their wars. But was it in either case legitimate? Your great reverence for the founders of your political school in Massachusetts, to say nothing of your respect for the authority of the African princes, or your faith in the Koran, will probably impel you to stand up in favor of the "ideas" which you have learned from them. But I think I can maintain the Christian laws of liberty in opposition to all your Mussulman notions; for God is great, and Mohammed is not His prophet.

It would be very unjust to deny that a great many men, from the earliest period of our history, were sincerely opposed to African slavery, from motives of religion, benevolence, and humanity. This sentiment was strong in the South as well as the North; and by none was it expressed with more fervor than by Jefferson himself, the great apostle of democracy. But this concession can hardly be made to the political abolitionists. As an almost universal rule, the leaders of that sect were ribald infidels, and their conventicles teemed with the most shocking blasphemy. They were by their own avowals the most cruel barbarians of any age. Servile insurrection and a general butchery of the southern people was a part of their programme from the beginning. The leaders to whom they gave their highest admiration were the men whose feet were the swiftest in running to shed innocent blood. Seward won their affections in early manhood by proposing measures from which civil war would be sure to come, and in which he promised that negroes should be incited to "rise in blackest insurrection." They applauded John Brown to the echo for a series of the basest murders on record. They did not conceal their hostility to the Federal and State governments, nor deny their enmity to all laws which protected the liberties of white men. The Constitution stood in their way, and they cursed it bitterly; the Bible was quoted against them, and they reviled God Almighty himself. I know that the mind of man, like his body, is fearfully and wonderfully made; I understand all the difficulty of analyzing human passions, and I admit that we should not judge harshly of motives; but how these heartless oppressors of their own race could have any care for the freedom of the negro passes my comprehension. Unless you can explain it otherwise, the judgment of history must inevitably be against the sincerity of their anti-slavery professions. In the present aspect of the case, it seems impossible to believe that love of the negro was not assumed as a mere excuse for enslaving the white race, just as their ancestors put on the pretense of piety to gratify their appetite for the property and blood of better people than themselves. You must positively reconsider this subject before you undertake again to present the abolitionists to the world in the respectable character of fanatics. I think you will find that the crew of the Mayflower brought over and planted no "germ of an idea" which has flourished with more vigor than their canting hypocrisy.

Here let me say again, that the vices and wickedness of the Plymouth colonists are not to be visited on the heads of their children according to the flesh. Among them, in every part of the country, are great statesmen, brave soldiers, true servants of the Church, and virtuous, patriotic democrats, who are no more responsible for the crimes of their ancestors than a peaceable Scotchman is for the raids and robberies which in past generations were committed by his clan upon the English border. But you acknowledge that you get your political ideas from them—you boast that your party has no doctrines of public law, and no notions of public duty which were not planted at Plymouth. Therefore, it is not only proper, but necessary, to show what these doctrines and ideas were.

I pass now to a later period. You say that there were two radically different theories about the nature of our Government: "The North, believing and holding that we were a nation, the South, insisting that we were only a confederation of sovereign States." It is not true that any such theoretical conflict ever existed between the sections. That the articles of confederation first, and the Constitution afterward, united the States together for certain purposes therein enumerated, and thus made us a nation among nations, was never denied that I know of by any party. But this national character was given to the General Government by sovereign States who confederated together for that purpose. They bestowed certain powers on the new political corporation then created, and called it the United States of America, and they expressly reserved to themselves all the sovereign rights not granted in the charter. Democratic statesmen had no theory about it. They saw their duty written down in the fundamental law, they swore to perform it, and they kept their oaths. They executed the powers of the General Government in their whole constitutional vigor, for that, as Mr. Jefferson said, was "the sheet anchor of our peace at home and our safety abroad;" and they carefully guarded the rights of the States as the only security we could have for a just administration of our domestic affairs. This was universally assented to as right and true. No counter theory was set up. Difference of construction there might be, but all admitted that when the line of power was accurately drawn between the Federal Government and State sovereignty, the rights on one side were as sacred as those on the other. But within two or three last years past the low demagogues of your party have got to putting in their platforms an assertion that this is a nation and not a confederation. What do they mean? What do you mean when you indorse and reproduce it? Do you deny that the States were sovereign before they united? Do you affirm that their sovereignty wholly merged in the Federal Government when they assented to the Constitution? Is the tenth amendment a mere delusion? Do you mean to assert that the States have not now and never had any rights at all, except what are conceded to them at the mercy of the "nation?" No doubt this new article was inserted in the creed of the abolitionists because they supposed it would give a sort of plausibility to their violent intervention in the internal affairs of the States; but this is so false, so shallow, and so destitute of all respectable authority that it imposes upon nobody.

As a part of this conflict of theories, and resulting from it, you describe the South as "insisting that each State had a right, at its own discretion, to break the Union, and constantly threaten secession, where the full rights of slavery were not acknowledged." In fact and in truth, secession, like slavery, was first planted in New England. There it grew and flourished, and spread its branches far over the land, long before it was thought of in the South, and long before the full rights of slavery were called in question by anybody! The anti-democrats of that region, in former as well as in latter times, totally misunderstood the purposes for which this Government was made.

They regarded it as a mere commercial machine, by which they could make much "gayneful pilladge," if allowed to run it in their own way. When they were disappointed in this by certain perfectly just and constitutional regulations of their trade which the common defense and general welfare made necessary, they immediately fell to plotting the dismemberment of the Union. Before 1807 they organized a conspiracy with the British authorities in Canada for the erection of New England into a separate republic under British protection. (See Carey's, Olive Branch, and the Henry correspondence.) Not long afterward, Josiah Quincy, whose fidelity to the party that elected him was never doubted, formally announced in Congress the intention of his State to leave the Union, "peaceably if she could, forcibly if she must." Their hatred of the Union deepened, and their determination to break it up grew fiercer, as the resolution of the democrats to maintain the independence of the country became stronger. When the war of 1812 began they were virtually out of the Union, and remained out during the whole of that desperate struggle, not only refusing all assistance to carry it on, but helping the enemy in every possible way. It was while England had her tightest grasp on the throat of the nation that the Hartford convention was called to dismember it; and this, Mr. Jefferson says, they would have accomplished but for the battle of New Orleans and the peace of Ghent. John Quincy Adams, in 1839, and Abraham Lincoln, in 1847, made elaborate arguments in favor of the legal right of a State to go out. The late abolitionists did not attempt to conceal their rancorous hostility to the Union. "No Union with slaveholders," was one of their watchwords, and down to the opening of the war its destruction was the avowed object of their machination.

There is one conclusive proof of your enmity to the Union, and that is your unwavering opposition to the Constitution which held the States together. You know as well as I do how absurd it is to suppose that any man or party can support the Union and at the same time trample on the Constitution; and you certainly are not ignorant that you and your predecessors, from the earliest times, have been anti-constitutional in all your proclivities. Contemptuous disregard of constitutional obligations is not now the mere germ of a doctrine; it is a part of your settled creed. Before the war and since, you have trodden under foot every provision contained in the great charter of our liberties. I do not speak at random. I challenge you to designate a single constitutional right of the States or individuals which you have not at some time or in some way deliberately violated.

This contempt for the Constitution, this practical denial that an oath to support it is sacred, implies a disregard of all laws, human and divine, and when adopted it left nothing to guide you except the propensities, evil or good, of your natural hearts. Many of you (and notably yourself) contracted no individual guilt, because you were too proud for petty larceny, too benevolent for large-handed robbery, and too full of kindness to break wantonly into the tabernacle of human life. But generally the moral principles of the abolitionists (if they ever had any) became so wholly perverted that they saw nothing wrong in the worst offenses that could be committed against their political opponents. In their eyes theft and murder not only lost their felonious character, but became meritorious, if the victims lived south of Mason and Dixon's line. When John Brown stole horses in the peace of God and the State of Missouri he was taking his lawful booty; when he sneaked into a quiet Virginia village on a Sunday night and assassinated defenseless citizens he was a hero, and when he died a felon's death on the scaffold, to which he was justly condemned, he became a martyr.

You persist in misunderstanding the ante-bellum attitude of the northern democracy. We stood steadfastly by the Union against all attempts of the New England party to break it up by secession. We sustained the Constitution against the ferocious assaults of the abolitionists; we labored earnestly to save republican institutions from the destruction with which they were threatened by you; and as long as the southern people acted with us we gratefully accepted their aid in the good work.

Your averment that the democratic party desired the aggrandizement of slavery and yielded their consciences on that subject to the South is grossly unjust, if you mean to charge them with anything more than willingness to protect the Southern as well as the Northern and Middle States in the exercise of their constitutional rights. We had disposed of slavery in our jurisdiction according to our sense of sound policy and justice. But we had made an express compact with the other States to leave the entire control of their domestic affairs to themselves. We kept our covenant simply because it would have been gross dishonesty to break it. The abolitionists took a different view, and refused to keep faith. They swore as solemnly as we did to observe the terms of the bargain, but according to their code it was a sin not to violate it. The fact is true that we did not think it right to cut the throats or shoot or strangle the men or women of the South for believing in negro slavery, but that is no justification of your assertion that we yielded our consciences to them.

Again: You charge us (the northern democracy) with having given bad advice to the southern people. This consisted, you say, in assuring them that if they seceded we would take their part against any attempt to force them back again into the Union. This is a gross error, and you will see it when I recall your attention to the facts. In all our exhortations to the southern men against secession we were met by the expression of their fear that the abolitionists intended, in any event, to invade and slaughter them. Some reason for this apprehension was given by the fierce threats of your leading men, and especially by your almost universal admiration of Brown for his raid into Virginia. Certainly democrats (and very good men too) did then declare that a lawless expedition intended for purposes of mere pillage could not and should not be started in the North without such opposition as would effectually stop it. But this was before secession, and it was intended to prevent that movement, not to encourage it.

You cannot, with any show of justice, deny that devotion to the Union was one of the strongest feelings in the heart of the northern democracy. We had always deprecated a separation from the Southern States with so much earnestness that one of the opprobrious epithets you bestowed on us was that of "Union savers." This was not a mere sentiment of admiration or gratitude to the southern men who had led us through the perils of the Revolution, settled our institutions, and given our country its high place in the estimation of the world. We felt all this, but we felt much more. The preservation of the Union was to us an absolute necessity. It was indispensable to the security of our lives, our personal liberty, and our plainest rights of property. How true this was at all times, and especially in 1860, you will see if you reflect a moment on our situation at that time.

The abolitionists were coming into power. I need not say by what combination of imposture and accident they got it. All the Northern States, as well as the Federal Government, fell into their hands. No doubt their dislike of southern people was very great; but northern democrats were objects of their special malignity. Long before that time, and ever since, this sentiment has been expressed in words and acts too plain to be misunderstood. You show how strong it is in your own heart when you tell southern men (and you do tell them so in this very speech) that you honor them a thousand times more than you do the democrats of the North. Remember, in addition to this, that the leading abolitionists acknowledged no law which might stand in the way of their interests or their passions. Against anybody else the Constitution of the country would have been a protection. But they disregarded its limitations, and had no scruples about swearing to support it with a predetermination to violate it. We had been well warned by all the men best entitled to our confidence—particularly and eloquently warned by Mr. Clay and Mr. Webster—that if ever the abolitionists got a hold upon the organized physical force of the country they would govern without law, scoff at the authority of the courts, and throw down all the defenses of civil liberty.

But if the South had not seceded we might have made a successful defense of our Constitution, though the powers of the Government were in the hands of its enemies. With the aid of the southern people, if they had been true to their duty, we could have organized an opposition so formidable in its moral and political power that you would scarcely have dared to assault us. No wonder that we were "Union savers;" for to us the Union meant personal liberty, free thought, and independent press, habeas corpus, trial by jury, the impartial administration of justice—all those great legal institutions which our forefathers had shed so much blood to build up.

The South deserted us at the crisis of our fate, and left us in our weakness to the mercy of the most unprincipled tyrants that ever betrayed a public trust. Secession was not merely madness and folly, it was something much worse. We could not but feel that we were deeply wronged. There was no remedy for the dire calamities with which we were threatened, except in bringing the seceding States back to their places in the Union. Our convictions of legal duty, our exasperated sense of injury, and a proper care for our best interests all impelled us to join the new Administration in the use of such forces as might be found necessary to execute the laws in every part of the country.

But the abolitionists wanted a war for the destruction of the Union, for the overthrow of the Constitution, for the subversion of free government, and for the subjugation of the whole country to that "higher law" which imposes no restraint upon the rapacity and malice of the ruling power. To such a war the national conscience was opposed. The soul of every respectable officer in the Army and Navy revolted at it, and every virtuous man in private life felt it to be an unspeakable outrage. To those who doubted before, the disaster of Bull Run made it plain that the war could not be successfully carried on unless it was put upon principles consistent with the usages of Christendom and the safety of our institutions. Therefore it was that on the 22d of July, 1861, Congress, with almost perfect unanimity, passed a resolution through both Houses, declaring in the most explicit words that the war should be conducted to preserve the Constitution and not to revolutionize it. I give you here the words of the resolution itself from the Congressional Globe, page 223:

"Resolved, That the present deplorable civil war has been forced upon the country by the disunionists of the Southern States, now in arms against the constitutional Government, and in arms around the capital; that in this national emergency Congress, banishing all feeling of passion or resentment, will recollect only its duty to the whole country; that this war is not waged on their part in any spirit of oppression, or for any purpose of conquest or subjugation, or purpose of overthrowing or interfering with the rights or established institutions of those States, but to defend and maintain the supremacy of the Constitution, and to preserve the Union with all the dignity, equality, and rights of the several States unimpaired, and that as soon as these objects are accomplished the war ought to cease."

Confiding in this assurance, democrats from every Northern State rushed to the front by the hundred thousands; the border States of the South gave in their formal adhesion to the Government, and our great military leaders drew their swords with alacrity in support of the free institutions to which they had shown their fidelity so often before.

With what base perfidy this solemn pledge was broken I need not tell you, for this speech shows that you know it well. You expressly declare that so far from sustaining the Government you revolutionized it. Instead of a war for the Union, you claim that it put the States out of the Union and you had a right to keep them out as long as you pleased, or admit them to their places on any terms, however degrading, which you chose to dictate. Instead of restoring the supremacy of the Constitution, all your politicians held, and so far as I know from their public declarations still hold, that the victory of the Federal forces abolished the Constitution not only in the South, but in the North, and therefore they were not bound to observe its limitations, either in their legislative, judicial, or executive measures. Instead of bringing back the States with their rights unimpaired, according to your promise, you crippled, enslaved, subjugated, and disfranchised them. Instead of using the war power for the just and lawful purposes to which you were pledged, you converted it into a black republican job to put the rights of all the people permanently under the feet of an unprincipled party.

I submit this part of the case to your consideration. I ask you to say whether you can find in the whole history of the human race another instance of similar perfidy on a scale so large. The baseness of the Massachusetts authority in selling the surrendered Pequods into slavery after a solemn promise to the contrary, was but the "germ of an idea," on which you acted in the fullness of its growth. Their act was in its nature and character nearly as bad as it could be; but only eight score of helpless people suffered by it; the victims of your treachery are counted by millions.

The offenses which you are now engaged in committing upon the public Treasury are the natural sequence of your crimes against popular liberty. Universal experience proves that power usurped will always be dishonestly used. Seeing that the abolitionists were led by men whom no oath could hold to the Constitution, and whom no pledge could bind to an observance of its principles, we had no right to expect a decent regard for justice in their administration of the national finances. I do not mean that the masses of your party were, or are now, destitute of common integrity. But that was overruled by the political doctrines of their leaders. Having once set aside the established law of the land, they had no standard by which they could measure the moral conduct of themselves or of others, and they became incapable of seeing the difference between right and wrong in public affairs. The "higher law" threw the reins loose on the neck of all evil passions. It not only abrogated the Constitution but the decalogue as well, and the eighth commandment was nullified with the rest.

You have consequently made ours the corruptest government on this side of Constantinople. Perhaps you will say this is a mere general assertion. But I am ready to maintain the truth of it against all opposers. You may take the rottenest monarchy in Europe, go over its history for a hundred years, and produce the worst act you can find of fraudulent spoliation upon its people; and if I do not show something worse committed here under the auspices of the party now in power, I will give up the case.

I am speaking of the Government—of the officials who rule us for their pleasure and plunder us for their personal profit—and it is no answer to quote Mr. Lord's speech before the Senate on the trial of Belknap. His eulogy was on the virtue and intelligence of the people, and he argued from that the duty of their servants to behave with integrity. He certainly did not mean to whitewash the Administration. If he had meant to do so he could not have succeeded, for there was not wash enough in his bucket to go over the twenty-thousandth part of the job.

While you were hunting for certificates of character among the speeches of the impeachment managers, why did you overlook that of Mr. HOAR? He said in effect (for I cite him from memory) that the one production in which our country excels all others in the world is the corruption of its Government. There was the testimony of a candid witness belonging to your own party, who knew whereof he affirmed, and spoke directly to the point.

But it is useless to cite the evidence of individuals upon great public facts that are felt and seen and known of all men. Nothing was ever more notorious than the general disregard of all sound principles by this administration. No people on earth are now suffering so much from extravagant taxation, and nowhere does so small a portion of the taxes go to legitimate public purposes, or so much to the rulers themselves and the rings they choose to favor. Industry is crushed as it never was before. Labor no longer works for itself since all and more than all of its surplus profits are exacted and consumed by the hangers-on of the Government. Now, although we call ourselves freemen, we are to all intents and purposes slaves, so long as you continue to make us hand over to you the earnings of our labor; for the essence of slavery consists in compelling one man, or class of men, to work for another without equivalent. We are determined to relieve ourselves from this intolerable bondage as far as we can legally and peaceably, and if you do not help us you must at least cease to mock us by pretending to be an anti-slavery man upon principle.

You tell us that the republican party "will punish its own rascals." The newspaper reports of your speech said that this was greeted with laughter from the republican side of the House. Certainly it sounds like the broadest of jokes. If you meant it in earnest, please to say what you found this claim of impartial justice upon. You will hardly prove it by showing that Bristow and Wilson succeeded, with much tribulation, in convicting certain manufacturers of crooked whisky, and thereby got themselves turned out of office. It is vain to deny that there is and has been a general system of dishonesty prevading all ranks of the civil service, which, so far from being punished, is protected, encouraged, and rewarded by the highest authorities. You have set your faces like flint against all investigations tending to expose rascality. Proof of that, if proof were wanting, would be found in your own denunciation of the present Congress for pushing its inquiries into those regions where venality and corruption might otherwise have dwelt in safety.

In all your southern measures you have shown a positive abhorrence of honest government. You forced into all places of power men whose characters were notoriously bad, and maintained them while they perpetrated the most shameless robberies. You resisted every effort of the oppressed people to throw them off, and when these efforts were successful in some of the States, you mourned the fall of the felons with sincere lamentations. Just look at the crew of godless wretches by whom Louisiana had been almost desolated! In the face of a constitutional interdict your Administration at Washington repeatedly interfered to shield them from justice, and to uphold them in the possession of power to which they had no manner of legal claim. At this moment they are preying upon the people of the State under the protection of Federal bayonets. Is that what you call punishing your own rascals?

You may answer that the white people of Louisiana, being conquered, are rightfully enslaved, according to the principles planted at Plymouth, and therefore it is not for the like of them to invoke the protection of law and justice. I will therefore call your attention to another case to which the Dahomeian rule does not apply, and in which the failure of the republican party to punish its own rascals has been equally signal; I mean the frauds of the Union Pacific Railroad Company and the Credit Mobilier.

You will pardon me, I am sure, for referring to this affair. You are the last man upon whom I would make a personal point, and I could not do it here if I would try; for the conviction I have often expressed remains unchanged, and your integrity was not stained by such connection as you had with that business. But we both know that it was the most gigantic fraud that the history of modern times discloses. The magnitude of the iniquity almost exceeds belief. The entire amount of the booty already taken from the public and stowed away into the pockets of the perpetrators cannot be less than one hundred million of dollars, and every six months they make a new demand, which is honored at the Treasury by an additional payment. I am told that a late Attorney-General counts one hundred and eighty millions as the sum which the United States will lose in solid cash directly taken out of the Treasury. I am not sure that this calculation is accurate, but it cannot be very far wrong, and it is not equal to one-half of the whole steal, for it does not include the value of the road itself, nor the land grants, nor the proceeds of the bonds to which the lien of the United States was postponed, nor the equipment bond. As this swindle was the largest, so it was one of the most inexcusably base. It was perpetrated at a time when the nation was swamped with debt, when the people were loaded with taxes, and when the most rigid economy was imperatively required. All circumstances, as well as the direct evidence, shows that it was no sudden act of thoughtless imprudence, but was willfully, deliberately, and corruptly prearranged and determined. There is nothing to mitigate it; you cannot defend it even by waving the bloody shirt.

How did the republican party "punish its own rascals" in this case? Not a hair on the head of any rascal was touched. On the contrary they were promoted, honored, and advanced; the most guilty of them are now, as they were before, the very darlings of the party. Even that is not the worst of it. These swindlers are periodically swelling the colossal proportions of their crime by taking out of the Treasury additional millions which they claim as the "precious results" of their original fraud. They have no better title to them than the wolf has to the mutton he slaughters by moonlight. The legal remedy against these exactions is so plain that ignorance alone could hardly miss it. But your officials have found out the way not to do it. They permit the Government to lie down and be robbed semi-annually by a corporation which Tilden would long ago have disarmed of its power, and whose criminal abettors he would have swept into the penitentiary by scores.

I repeat that I do not blame you as an active accomplice of this wickedness. But you ought to have come out from the evil and corrupt fellowship as soon as you saw how evil and corrupt it was. You owed it to yourself, your Church, and your country to break off at once from political associations capable of such indefensible conduct. But your acceptance of the doctrines planted at Plymouth by the Yankees blinded your judgment, and made your conscience inaccessible to the principles planted in Jerusalem by the "people first called Christians" at Antioch.

You would have us believe that Hayes, if elected, will reform abuses and give us a pure administration. Your statement and that of other gentlemen equally reliable make it certain that Mr. Hayes bears an irreproachable character in all his private relations. I do not doubt his possession of that negative honesty which it is a disgrace to want. I accord him those tame household virtues which entitle him to the respect of his neighbors and the confidence of his family; but he can no more stem the torrent of republican corruption than he can swim against the rapids of Niagara. His whole history shows that he would not even make an effort to do so. He has been most happily called "a man of tried subserviency."

A reformer in these times must be made of stern material. He must have no connections with and be under no obligation to the authors of the abuses which need reform. Above all things, he must not have consented expressly or impliedly to the commission of the public wrongs which his duties as a reformer would require him to punish. When he comes to oppose wickedness in high places the consciousness that he himself is in parie delicto will make a strong man as nerveless as infancy.

* * * * * * *

Speaking of reconstruction, and seeing your broad accusations of treason, I am tempted to ask if you are sure that you yourself and your associates did not commit that crime.

In March, 1867, the then existing Government of the Union was supreme all over the country, and every State had a separate government of its own for the administration of its domestic concerns. The Government was entitled then, if it ever was, to the universal obedience of all citizens, and you, its officers, had taken a special oath of fidelity to it. Nevertheless you made a deliberate arrangement not only to withdraw your support from it but to overthrow it totally in ten of the States, and this you did by military force. In all the South you levied war against the nation and against the defenseless States, destroyed the free government of both, and substituted in their place an untempered and absolute despotism.

Now suppose you had been indicted for this, how could you have escaped the condemnation of the law? I know your excuses and I can understand your claims to mercy; but what legal defense could you have made consistent with your own argument and the decision of the court in the Milligan case?

I cannot describe to you how unpleasant is the sensation produced by your profession of a desire for peace. Why do you not give us peace if you are willing we shall have it? You need but to cease hostilities and the general tranquillity will be restored. You refuse to do that because peace would endanger your party ascendency. To maintain your plunderers in power you have uniformly resorted to the bayonet—you have made civil war the chronic condition of the country; wherever you could you have displaced liberty, fraternity, and equality, and given nothing instead but infantry, artillery, and cavalry. You are at this moment openly engaged in preparing your battalions for armed intervention in the struggle of the people with the carpet-baggers.

What makes this worse is your closing declaration that you will take no step backward. There is to be no repentance, no change of policy, and consequently no peaceful or honest government. "Onward," you say, is the word. Onward—to what? To more war, more plunder, more oppression, more universal bankruptcy, heavier taxes, and still worse frauds on the public Treasury.

J. S. BLACK.]

Mr. HALE obtained the floor.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. HARRIS in the chair.) Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. BURNSIDE. I shall detain the Senate but a moment; I do not wish to make a speech.

Mr. HALE. I yield to the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Mr. President, I will not attempt to follow the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] in his arguments upon the rights of majorities and minorities; neither will I attempt to answer him in what he has said with reference to some of the New England States. Those arguments and references will be taken care of by other Senators much better able to take care of them than I am; but I desire to say a few words as to the point at issue between the Senator and myself, and they will be very few.

The Senator said in his remarks the other day:

> The point in the Senate is not so much "a free ballot and a fair count" in the South, in Virginia and elsewhere. When that question does come up, I shall have something to say. The real question here is, Has there been a disgraceful bargain in the Senate by which the offices of the Senate are proposed to be turned over to somebody else?

After a short colloquy between the Senator and myself, he made this remark:

> I have made no such charge; but, Mr. President, if I do not demonstrate it by irrefragable testimony I will resign my seat in this Senate.

If every member on both sides of the Chamber were to assert to-day that the Senator from South Carolina had failed in producing the irrefragable proof, I should say, for one, let him remain in his seat; we do not desire him to give it up.

And now with reference to the proofs that he has presented here let me say——

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator will pardon me——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Do the Senator from Rhode Island and the Senator from Maine consent to yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. BURNSIDE. I yield.

Mr. BUTLER. I wish to make but one remark. If, on the other hand, I have succeeded in establishing that fact, permit me to say to my friend that I shall not ask him to give up his committee. [Laughter.]

Mr. BURNSIDE. I am very much obliged to the Senator for that. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. President, I do not desire to disparage the efforts of the Senator from South Carolina, as he knows; but I can only say that while the statements of the indictment he has presented here have been very skillfully clustered, there is nothing new in them. They have all been presented by some Senator or other in different forms for the last four or five or six weeks; and that is what I complain of. Now the Senator from South Carolina has endeavored to try Senators on this side of the Chamber by the rules of evidence by which criminals are convicted, instead of the courtesy of the Senate; he has unwittingly adopted this method. I am quite sure he meant no harm by it; but he has adopted this method, and all the Senators on that side of the Chamber for weeks have adopted the same method. During my experience in the Senate I can freely say that I have never known a general charge made by one side of the Chamber against the other side of the Chamber of corruption which was followed up from day to day and from week to week, right in the face of the absolute denial of Senators upon their honor that there was any such corruption in existence. Men get up here in an excited manner once in a while and make excited speeches and charge things which the main body of Senators on their side would not be willing to follow up for weeks and weeks, and which a great many Senators might not agree with them in; and violent speeches are made here often; but for one side of the Chamber for weeks to persist in charging corruption on the other side of the Chamber I say is wrong, and as I said the other day it ought to stop. There is no power on this side of the Chamber to stop it; the power rests on the other side. You make these charges and you make them in the face of absolute denials from this side that any such thing exists; and the courtesy of the Senate ought to make you feel that we are telling you the truth and you have no right to make them.

The Senator has said in the course of his remarks that we had asked for no investigation, or rather that the Senator from Virginia had asked for no investigation. He will remember that I made this remark when I was speaking the other day:

> If the Senator from South Carolina or any other Senator on that side will move for the raising of a committee to investigate and put every Senator on this floor upon oath, I will vote for the resolution, and so will every member on this side vote to call every single Senator before a committee and place him under oath.

I said more there than I had a right to say, because I could only speak for myself; but I can say that I believe every Senator here will vote for it, and then it can be ascertained exactly what all Senators on both sides of the Chamber have said to the Senator from Virginia, and that is just exactly what the country ought to have. It ought to have the whole truth in this matter. We cannot ask a committee to investigate ourselves. We will grant you a committee to investigate this whole subject; and now I will wind up by saying that all charges that there is corruption on this side of the Chamber are false.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I have had no desire to take part in this debate, nor have I now any preparation for it. The other day I was called for a little into it by allusions made by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. LAMAR] to an old speech of mine, delivered years ago in the other House, upon the southern governments; and I now rise, impelled by what has just been said by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] about my own State. The picture that he has seen fit to draw of the civilization of the State of Maine, the recital of individual horrors, and the charge that followed that recital, of a lower form of social life in my own State, is mainly what has called me up.

My colleague [Mr. FRYE] who is absent, as is well known upon this floor, has ample capabilities to take care of himself; it is not for me to reply to what falls every day from gentlemen on the other side in answer to his speech delivered here a week ago, in which he clearly "ruffled all their vesture," and that replication I leave to him.

The Senator from South Carolina is restive and sensitive, as indeed are most of the Senators upon that side of the Chamber, over charges made from this side relating to what? Not the commission of individual offenses in any township or city of the South, which may be punished in the courts as is the fashion of all law-abiding communities, but over charges made seriously and honestly here that the spirit and purpose of this Government of ours is countervailed and overthrown in their States; and it has been the fashion to retort by the raking up from private letters and the columns of the partisan press of the Northern States instances where somebody or other has fallen from virtue in these Northern States, as if that were an answer to the proposition upon which this side of the House puts itself before the country.

The Senator from South Carolina has traveled far and northward to my own State, and finds as he indicates here a condition of things in no degree pleasing to him, an offset, he calls it, to what my colleague referred to the other day as the "barbarism" of his section. I wish that the Senator knew more about the people of the State of Maine that I have the honor in part to represent upon this floor. It is a far-away State. Its people dwell upon a rocky coast or in a near interior not less rough. Its territory is covered with the snows of winter for half of the year. The employments there develop frugality, hardihood, bravery, and manhood, as the State has shown in all its crises. They develop more than that, Mr. President; they develop a power of self-control which results in a determination to seek a refuge from all evils under all the forms of law. The Senator has called upon the "Highest Power" to save him, after his recital from newspapers and private letters of crimes committed in that State, from the "Bible and the school-house of the State of Maine."

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator will pardon me; of course the Senator does not desire to misrepresent me. I said from the Bible and the school-book from which such crimes as those sprang.

Mr. HALE. I believe I did not misstate the Senator; I did not intend to do so. Maine is a State full of school-houses and churches which have made its sober and enduring people. Can the Senator from South Carolina say as much for his State? The school-house is found at every corner, and the hillside is decorated with the church. The system of education is broad and general and all-embracing. Here and there throughout the State, rough as it is, inclement as its climate is, seminaries of learning of a higher kind spring up and prosper. In out-of-the-way corners are found the academies and the colleges where the young men of the State as they grow up are educated. Does the Senator find fault with that?

Is it from the spirit which has brought these things about in the State that he wishes to be delivered? In those colleges are taught, first, patriotism and veneration for the Constitution, and regard for all the laws; after that, the beauties that dwell in our English literature, the classics, the mathematics, and a sober, candid, and sincere oratory mourned in South Carolina as one of the lost arts. Does the Senator from South Carolina object to the life and character that springs from this?

The Senator has seen fit to read here accounts of individual crimes committed in the State of Maine. Does the Senator believe that that could not be done with every State and every people existing under the heavens? The difference between him and me, between his people and mine—and I say it with no desire to array one against the other, and only because I am forced into this debate—the broad, the fundamental difference between his people and mine is that where a crime occurs such as he has read, or such as he has not ventured to read aloud because of its foulness, my people punish those who commit the foul deeds. We have the State prison and the county jail for that purpose, and year by year the operation of the criminal statutes of the State of Maine goes on silently and resistlessly. There has been no great individual wrong committed in my State against the laws of the State that has not been dealt with and avenged by the Nemesis of the written and obeyed law. Can the Senator from South Carolina say as much for his State?

I do not know that the Senator is able precisely to appreciate all the habits and ways and forms of life of a people who are steeped in the conviction and determination to abide by all the laws. I put the record of my own State in that regard against his. We were cleaved from the mother State fifty years ago and sat up for ourselves in the business of governing a State and its people. We have had our fair measure of prosperity since that time, and have been represented here and in the other body by full delegations representing the people of the State.

I will not go over the names of those who have been well known, not only at home but all over the country, who have illustrated the political history of Maine. I only say that at all times and under all emergencies the representatives of the State of Maine, whatever party they may have belonged to, have always represented loyalty, patriotism, and obedience to the laws. They took their inspiration in this from the people who sent them here. Can the Senator from South Carolina say as much for his State? Is it not as well known to him as to me and to all men that if at any time under any emergency there has been in the bevy an "unruly sister" it has been his own State? Growing up an honored and trusted citizen of South Carolina, has the Senator become unconsciously so impregnated with its spirit that he fails to appreciate the simple, law-abiding virtues of a Northern State like my own?

I do not mean (and I have not had the time to produce the record) to go back and fully contrast the history of the two States. I do not need to compare the men produced by either one with the other. There is plenty of material. I might go back and recall every step that has been taken by the authorities of the Senator's State in defiance of the General Government and of the proposition that this Republic is dedicated to the duty of maintaining the rights of its citizens wherever they may be. I might go back and read the "nullification" resolution, and quote from the debates here and in the Senator's own State in years gone by. I might go back to 1844 and cite that amazing statute of South Carolina in which it is provided that the colored citizen of any State found within the borders of South Carolina shall be arrested and held in durance. I might recite the story of what followed; how an eminent citizen of Massachusetts went to South Carolina for the purpose of testing, in our northern fashion, in the courts whether such a statute could be allowed to hold and be enforced. Everybody knows that story. Law-abiding as was the effort of Massachusetts in appealing to the touchstone in such controversies, the higher courts, it hopelessly failed. Her eminent son was driven from the State and denied the right to maintain his cause in the courts.

I have said that our people are a hardy, frugal, self-denying people; but there has been one thing that has never failed to arouse them, the patriotic impulse. The Senator from South Carolina has reproached my colleague because he did not do his fighting in the field. I take to myself no shame, neither would my colleague if present, that we were of the many thousands and millions of loyal men in the North who did not need to go into the war for the suppression of the rebellion in order to insure its success. The North put not forth half its real strength in that great conflict; and there were duties to be performed in maintaining it as well at home as in the field; and it is no reproach to any man upon this floor or elsewhere that his sphere of duty did not place him face to face with the Senator from South Carolina on the battle-field. I very well remember when the first gun from the Senator's State aroused the loyal heart of the State of Maine, and men stepped into the ranks from every town and village and city; and when their places became vacant they were filled and refilled and thrice filled. The Senator has seen fit to contrast my own State with his, and I ask him here and now whether he believes that his State had a better record than mine in 1861, whether the gun that summoned the loyal men from Maine or the tramp of the men from Maine who went forth to meet and overcome the danger which that gun announced represented the highest sentiment?

But the Senator from South Carolina says that his State has been ill-used since the war. Since the war was over the State of Maine has been represented in Congress by Senators and Representatives with two exceptions members of the republican party. I have been running over the record of the delegation from the State of Maine upon some of the subjects-matter that have every day been coming before Congress; and upon one subject I find an unbroken record, the treatment of the Southern States as illustrated by legislation incorporated into our statutes.

The Senator from South Carolina bewails because, as he says, the attack upon his section never ceases, and he charges that every speech that is made from this side of the Chamber is only new evidence of the hate that is kept up against his section. Does the Senator from South Carolina know of what he talks when he makes that charge? I commend him to the record of my predecessors upon this floor and the delegation from the State of Maine in the other House for the last sixteen years. There was never a proposition for the readmission of one of the rebellious States into the Union that the delegation from the State of Maine did not vote as a unit in its favor. Take the great and at one time absorbing question of amnesty in its diverse forms, and the Senator who now complains that Maine has had nothing but unkindness and revenge for his people will find the record of Maine unbroken. In my own service in the other House I reported and urged the most sweeping amnesty bill that was ever passed by the American Congress. There never has been a time except in one instance when an individual petition for complete amnesty and oblivion of political offenses has been presented in the other Chamber or in this that it has not received the vote of every Senator and Representative from the State of Maine. Let the Senator look at the record. The years since the peace have been mainly years of republican ascendency; and the delegation from the State of Maine was in the forefront of the work of peaceful reconciliation and the amnesty and forgiveness and oblivion of political offenses. Is not the Senator himself an instance of the kindness and justice and magnanimity of the delegation from the State of Maine?

Mr. BUTLER. I am not making any complaint personally. I have been very kindly treated. I am not making the slightest complaint; and I desire to say to the honorable Senator that my remarks were not at all addressed to anything that he had said or done personally or individually, or to any other individual Senator. I have nothing personally to complain of.

Mr. HALE. I know the Senator has not. I regret very much that he saw fit in his speech to make his attack upon my State and to draw the picture that he did of the condition of things in that State.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the Senator permit me again to say that I have made no attack upon Maine? I was simply defending my own State from the attacks of his colleague, which I thought justified all that I said. I did not recite the crimes (that I knew nothing about until I saw them in his own press) with a view of reflecting upon him, but as his colleague had charged that thousands and thousands of crimes and assassinations and wrongs had been perpetrated in my State, which must indicate a low order of civilization, I simply desired to point out that if that was the criterion he himself had something to look to at home. I made no attack upon Maine; I have a very great regard and respect for it; and I desire now to say to the Senator from Maine that I have never complained of anything that he personally has said or done. I was replying to his colleague, and I am very sorry, as I said, that his colleague is not here. I know the Senator's kindly feeling to Senators from the South, I know his liberality, and I am not complaining of him personally.

Mr. HALE. One word as to affidavits read by the Senator upon what is fairly an issue here, the method of conducting elections in the State of Maine. The Senator has read two or three political articles from well-known notorious partisan sheets in the State of Maine, one being the Eastern Argus. I leave it to him whether that is a piece even of political evidence. But he has followed it up by affidavits or summaries of affidavits from different persons in different counties of the State of Maine alleging fraud and bribery touching the election in the State of Maine in 1879. I know something about that election. To begin with, as one instance that the Senator cited shows, the organization of the different towns and the management and control of the elections were almost entirely outside of the hands of the republican party that year; for in the year before and in the spring elections of 1879 what was known as the greenback movement, with which the democratic party of the State of Maine coalesced, swept the State high and dry. I have a vivid recollection of that. I was carried off my own feet in that disastrous election of 1878, and for a time the places here that had known me knew me no more. By that movement, as I have said, the control of the polls throughout the State passed largely out of the hands of the republican party. So, as in the case of the town of Lincoln, which the Senator from South Carolina cited, if there was any misconduct or bad behavior by the authorities at the election it was at the hands of democrats or fusionists, if they controlled the polls, as I think they did, at that time in that town.

I know something more about that election. It was a most important, a most hotly contested election, and it was an election that was not settled at the polls, because it was that year that the fusion government, made up of democrats and greenbackers, boldly and defiantly refused to accept the results of the election, and counted out dozens of members of the Legislature, who had been elected at the polls by the people, and undertook to set up a government of their own—a Legislature and all the executive branches. I commend the Senator from South Carolina to read carefully that chapter of our political history where the endurance and the patience of a people were put to a harder strain perhaps than had ever been witnessed in the United States, and where, after all, the result was a peaceful emergence.

Let me tell the Senator that where these charges of bribery and fraud came to the public ear and were brought out to the public light, they were put into the courts, for that is our fashion, and submitted to the grand juries in order that there might be a fair test as to whether the charges were false or true. I telegraphed a little while ago to the county attorney in one of the counties where such charges were made, and here is the dispatch that I have just received:

APRIL 28, 1881.

All fusion charges of fraud in Washington County were presented by me to the grand jury and fully heard. The jury decided by unanimous vote that testimony was not sufficient to support the charges in any case.

C. B. ROUNDS, County Attorney.

This is the way that we deal with such matters in Maine. I do not know who has sent to the Senator from South Carolina his batch of affidavits, but I think that I recognize in them a gathering up by a Boston partisan newspaper, which everybody in Maine knew was prepared for the purpose of diverting attention from the colossal frauds of the Garcelon administration in what all know as the "counting-out" performance.

That whole performance was gone over by a committee of the Legislature of Maine, of which I was a member, in the winter of 1880. I shall not consume any of the time of the Senate by anything more than calling attention to a report made by that committee contained in this volume, (Public Documents of the State of Maine, volume 3, page 43,) in which all the testimony is printed. The report of the majority is found here, and also the report of the minority representing the party of the Senator from South Carolina, a brief report, which on my own motion was printed by the State with the majority report, and I commend the Senator's attention to it:

The undersigned, a minority of the committee of investigation, appointed by virtue of an order of the House, dated February 5, 1880, beg leave to submit the following brief minority report:

Silence on part of the undersigned would be construed as an assent to all the positions and conclusions of the majority report, as well as in the statement of facts.

The undersigned are unwilling and unable to give their assent to all of the arguments and conclusions of such majority report, though they cannot deny that the recital of facts in the report is substantially in accordance with the evidence. Mr. Moody, of the council of Governor Garcelon, was before the committee, but he failed to explain the irregularities which had been proved.

Governor Garcelon also testified at a later period in the investigation that he had no previous knowledge of much which has been shown by the testimony to need explanation.

A letter, courteous in its language, was addressed by the clerk of the committee to each of the other members of Governor Garcelon's council saying that an opportunity would be granted them to appear and testify.

The undersigned regret that the members of the council have not seen fit to appear and explain the irregularities which seem to exist.

The evidence being uncontradicted, the undersigned cannot make a denial of the facts proved by it, and can only withhold their assent to the conclusions arrived at by the majority of the committee.

HENRY INGALLS.
GEORGE F. HILL.

The result, as everybody knows, was the establishing of the true Legislature and the dispossession of the fraudulent one, and a complete peace in the State. The mob to which the Senator alludes was no mob, and not a man's hair was harmed in the affair. The next year, in a close election, if the governor and council, then being republican, had sought to take advantage even of plain legal technicalities, the democratic or fusion candidates would have been counted out. The republican Legislature of Maine ignored all such technicalities and declared General Plaisted, the fusion candidate for governor, elected, and he is to-day administering the government of the State.

I do not think that I need to go further in showing the record of the State of Maine, or in defense of the people of that State, or in setting forth their ways and their life. And besides, that is not the question before the Senate. What the men and women of Maine do or say has nothing to do with what is keeping us here from day to day. It has sometimes seemed to me as if a great many people outside fail to appreciate precisely the conditions under which this deadlock, so called, has been maintained.

The Senator from South Carolina and other Senators upon that side are not sensitive because two or three score of officers of the Senate are menaced. I give them the credit for deeper, wider reasons, stronger motives than that. It is the assault made upon their column by the Senator from Virginia that alarms them; it is because that assault upon their column has taken the form of a popular election in Virginia at which all men voted or might have voted had they so willed. This makes the Senator from South Carolina and other Senators sensitive. The world knows, and Senators must be blind if they do not see that it has come about in these last years in the Southern States that a large portion of the men entitled by the Constitution and the laws to vote do not vote. Nobody disputes that. The figures that are presented from that side of the Chamber as well as this admit that, and yet there have been most important elections, elections of as vital concern to the Southern States as to the Northern States, and the remarkable fact has been developed that while year by year we at the North supposed that we had attained our culminating vote, it has been increased at every presidential election, while in the Southern States it has fallen off largely—in some States from 20 to 40 per cent. This is a startling fact. We have one explanation of this; the Senators on the other side present another; and for more than ten years it has been the fashion for every Senator upon that side when he rises to debate this question to deny in toto and by wholesale, as one Senator did the other day, that there had been in his State a single case of the suppression of free ballot.

Why, Mr. President, I have been at times in a state of half stupefaction listening to these denials. I have no time and have had no preparation to go to the record and bring up cases in detail. My colleague did that the other day. But, sir, if the statement that a free ballot has been almost everywhere in the South suppressed by violence and fraud be not true, all the history of congressional investigation for the last ten years is a myth. If it be not true that the suffrage has been taken with rough hands and strangled in State after State, then the volumes of investigation conducted by the brightest and keenest minds in the Senate and the House are a batch of perjuries. If it be not true, the testimony not only of republicans but of old democrats like Mr. James B. Campbell, of South Carolina, is nothing but a tissue of lies. Should I begin that record; should I even exhaust the volumes that have been sent to me since I began speaking, should I read the sworn testimony taken in half a dozen States; should I take up this book at my hand and read the feeling, fervent, moving words of Reverdy Johnson on this subject drawn forth by a display of heartrending facts just as much denied then as has been all testimony of the kind ever since, I should only begin the record. Let me read a little from the argument of the great lawyer to whom I have just referred. He was engaged in defending the perpetrators of these political crimes.

But Mr. Attorney-General—

This is from Reverdy Johnson—has remarked, and would have you suppose, that my friend—

His associate counsel—

and myself are here to defend, justify, or to palliate the outrages that may have been perpetrated in your State by this association of Ku Klux. He makes a great mistake as to both of us. I have listened with unmixed horror to some of the testimony which has been brought before you. The outrages proved are shocking to humanity; they admit of neither excuse or justification; they violate every obligation which law and nature imposes upon men; they show that the parties engaged were brutes, insensible to the obligations of humanity and religion. The day will come, however, if it has not already arrived, when they will deeply lament it. Even if justice shall not overtake them, there is one tribunal from which there is no escape. It is their own judgment, that tribunal which sits in the breast of every living man—that small, still voice that thrills through the heart, the soul of the mind, and as it speaks gives happiness or torture—the voice of conscience, the voice of God. If it has not already spoken to them, in tones which have startled them to the enormity of their conduct, I trust, in the mercy of Heaven, that that voice will speak before they shall be called above to account for the transactions of this world; that it will so speak as to make them penitent; and that, trusting in the dispensations of Heaven, whose justice is dispensed with mercy, when they shall be brought before the bar of their great Tribunal, so to speak, that incomprehensible Tribunal, there will be found, in the fact of their penitence or in their previous lives, some grounds upon which God may say PARDON.

Mr. BUTLER. May I ask the honorable Senator what year that was?

Mr. HALE. Eighteen hundred and seventy-one.

Mr. BUTLER. I should like to ask him who was governor of the State of South Carolina at that time?

Mr. HALE. There appears to have been very little government there; I do not know who was governor.

Mr. BUTLER. I will state to the honorable Senator that one of his political friends was governor—Governor Scott.

Mr. HALE. Quite likely.

Mr. BUTLER. And the Legislature was entirely republican.

Mr. HALE. But what had that to do with these fearful, enormous crimes which were then denied by the wholesale, just as all such and later charges of violence to the colored man and the ballot are denied now? The great democratic lawyer and statesman, Reverdy Johnson, admitted them and I have given his eloquent protest against them.

Mr. President, I wish I had the time to read the sworn testimony of James B. Campbell, resident in Charleston County, in the Senator's own State, a lawyer of distinction, who had practiced in his profession over forty years, who, as he says in his testimony, had been nothing but a democrat in his politics, and who gives an account of the oppression and frauds at the polling-places in Charleston in 1878, less than three years ago. I have no doubt the Senator from South Carolina knows this record, I have no doubt he has read it, I have no doubt that he knows Mr. Campbell. He cannot believe that there is nothing in such testimony.

I might take the volumes of the investigating committees which are loaded with recitals that shock a common humanity. I might read that pathetic, touching letter from Governor Chamberlain issued from his executive chamber at Columbia, South Carolina, July 22, 1876, appealing to the President of the United States that the strong arm of the General Government should be uplifted to protect republican institutions in the State of South Carolina. I might read the almost despairing answer of the President of the United States who realized, because he had in vain attempted before to see that the laws were executed, how powerless he was before an entire dominant race who were determined that the laws should not be executed. Have not Senators learned that these things have passed into the domain not of controversy but of history.

I have wondered how it is, by what mental process, the Senator from South Carolina, a cultivated man, a thoughtful man, a broad man, a man who tries I have no doubt to be candid, has been able to build up the hardihood that denies in toto these charges.

The newspapers, the exponents and representatives of day-by-day sentiment, tell the story. Somebody has handed me, while the Senator was talking, and I have just had time to glance at it and see how pertinent it is, the News and Courier, of Charleston, of Saturday, April 23, 1881, in which is this article:

THE END AND THE MEANS.

Senator HAMPTON, in his speech in the Senate on Thursday, admitted that there had been irregularities and fraud at elections in this State, and announced his unalterable determination to try at the earliest moment to rectify the wrong that had been done.

I may say here that I was interested and moved by the speech made by the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. HAMPTON.] I clearly discovered in that speech the honest determination of a man by every purpose and every power at his command to correct an existing evil. If Senators on the other side would deal with this question in that manner, we should find, speedily, a different feeling at the North. We do not fail to realize the great difficulties besetting the Southern communities after the war; I have never failed to realize these difficulties. I have spoken myself plainly of the excesses of the carpet-bag governments in their early days, and have sympathized fully with the feelings of men desirous of relief; but the chosen method of relief, the invocation of violence, the determination to put down one-half of the voters by the strong hand, is colossal in its injustice and wickedness compared with the evil sought to be cured. There has never been any reason why the Southern States, admitting if you will faults in their governments after the war, should not have patiently gone through the method of relief by peaceful processes.

But I read further from the News and Courier in its comments on Senator HAMPTON'S speech:

The "irregularities," or whatever else we please to call them were justified and justifiable, just as revolution or rebellion is permissible when there is no other escape from tyrannical government, under which neither life nor property is safe. It is manlier to rest on the right of revolution, whatever form it takes, than on denials which do not carry convictions, and on evasions which deceive nobody worth deceiving.

Senator HAMPTON in his speech at Blackville on July 4, 1878, said frankly that if elections were to be carried by fraud the State would soon cease to be worth saving. What was done in 1876, in 1878, and in 1880 was necessary. Similar work is indispensable no longer, and the people will not put up with it. The democratic masses cannot be whipped or spurred up to the point of taking the chances of Albany penitentiary. It is not right that they should, for there is not the need now that there was before.

Nothing but the unalterable determination of the white people of the State to carry the elections, by hook or by crook, put the democratic party in position to prove, in practice, that, under democratic rule, the taxes would be lowered, that the laws would be justly administered, and that the condition of the whole people would rapidly improve. These are facts, not promises.

That is democratic authority right at the Senator's home. This is frankly dealing with the case. The New Orleans Times delivers itself after this fashion:

It is true that some of the southern Senators, in their speeches during the debate, declared in favor of a fair ballot and a free count, but it cannot be denied that there is a firmly rooted conviction in the minds of a very large portion of the southern people that the democratic party, which contains the wealth and intelligence of the South, ought to rule, whether it has a majority of the votes or not. There is a deep-seated aversion to allowing negroes a voice in public affairs, or to allowing men, not natives, to acquire political prominence through the aid of negro votes.

Now, sir, it is the profound belief of a very large majority of the northern people that the sentiments contained in these newspapers have been made the prevailing sentiment of the South. Senators deny it. They take that form of meeting the question; and that denial involves a denial of the statements of fact upon which this northern belief rests. It is attempted to sweep it all away by the simple declaration that none of these conditions exist, that the facts have not been proved, that the story of the Louisiana parishes is a lie, that the tale of the Shoe-string district in Mississippi is a conjuring of the imagination, that Kemper County has never been understood, that the tissue ballots of South Carolina and the atrocities in Sumter County and other counties exist only in the brains of bad men who have deceived the people.

Why, sir, it is as easy to blot out all the undoubted historic landmarks of the past as to wipe out what is the truth as demonstrated by scores of investigations. Denial does not help this. You may as well take up any piece of accepted historic testimony and deny it; you may as well deny the horrors of the Black Hole of Calcutta or the massacre of Glencoe in the fastnesses of Scotland or the ravage of Bulgaria as to deny that these atrocities in the South have been committed and have been proven. That is no wise way to deal with this question. I speak with unfeigned reluctance upon this subject; I speak, feeling that I, as a young and new Senator, have no right to urge older and graver and wiser Senators to change their methods; but I can assure them in all sincerity, with no desire, with no tendency in my mind to inflame or exasperate, that every time these subjects are presented and brought before the public mind in Congress or elsewhere, the proofs of the southern methods of violence and fraud only leave their case in a worse condition in the northern mind. That mind will not brook that the suffrage shall be longer molested. It may as well be known that the republican party is dedicated to this one single proposition over and above all other things, and that everywhere, all over the Republic, the man who has a right to vote under the laws and the Constitution at a national election shall be permitted, if he will, to exercise that right. This may assume a thousand forms; it will be a thing, it may be, to be fought out and settled and ended by another generation, but there will never be abiding peace in this country until this question is settled and settled right. There will never be the peace that southern Senators, patriotic and enlightened and able, desire for their people until not only does every man have a right to cast his vote and have it counted, but until you have convinced the people of the North that that is the proposition on which you conduct your government. All discussion and protestation will be of no avail; all denial will go for naught until it is as safe and free for a man to vote in South Carolina as it is in Maine, in Louisiana as it is in Massachusetts, in Mississippi as it is in Vermont.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I really must apologize for delaying the Senate; but inasmuch as the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] has quoted Governor Chamberlain and has said that he has no doubt in the early days of the carpet-bag governments in South Carolina and the South generally there was some fraud and wrong, I want to have some quotations read from the utterances of Governor Chamberlain to bring it down later than the time to which he referred. I will therefore ask the Secretary to read from the point where I have marked in pencil so that it may go on record with the statement of Governor Chamberlain's letter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested by the Senator from South Carolina.

The Secretary read as follows:

THE CONTINGENT FUND STEAL.

During the past six years there has been appropriated and paid for contingent funds the astounding sum of $376,832.74. I venture the opinion that the State would have received equal benefit from one-fifth of that sum, if expended with economy upon proper objects.—Inaugural address, 1874.

LEGISLATIVE PLUNDER.

Since 1868 six regular and two special sessions of the General Assembly have been held. The total cost of these sessions has been $2,147,430.97. The average cost of each regular session has been $320,405.16. The lowest cost of any regular session was that of the regular session of 1868–'69, amounting to $169,005.79, and the highest cost was that of the regular session of 1871–'72, amounting to about $617,234.10. Besides these amounts now specified there are outstanding of bills payable, issued on account of legislative expenses during the same period, $192,275.15. These figures render comment superfluous.—Inaugural address, 1874.

LONG SESSIONS.

I find the average length of the regular sessions (of the General Assembly) since 1868 has been one hundred and five days. * * * I cannot see at present any reason of a public nature which can require a session of more than thirty days.—Inaugural address, 1874.

INCIDENTAL GRABS.

The average expenditure at each regular session, since 1868, for attachés and contingent or incidental expenses, has been about $258,424.65. If these figures do not teach their own lesson, then argument would be idle. Let it be borne in mind also that the amounts now stated represent only the actual payments made. There remains a vast amount of unpaid claims in the form of legislative pay expenses, estimated at not less than $500,000.—Inaugural address, 1874.

THE PRINTING RING.

The system (of public printing) which has prevailed for the past three years is utterly incapable of defense or excuse. The looseness of the system in theory is only equaled by its extravagance in practice. * * * The cost of the permanent and current printing from 1868 to the present time was $843,073.59. The cost of advertising the statutes, that is, of printing them in the newspapers for the same period, was $261,496.32, making a total cost to the State of $1,104,569.91. During the past three years the cost to the State of current and permanent printing was $743,933.20, and the cost of printing the laws in newspapers for the same period was $174,696.66, making a total cost to the State of $918,629.86.—Inaugural address, 1874.

NOT PAYING AS YOU GO.

The existing deficiencies, running back to 1868, are simply enormous. The deficiencies for the fiscal year ending October 31, 1874, were $472,619.54. The deficiencies for the fiscal year ending October 31, 1873, were $540,328.—Inaugural address, 1874.

TRIAL JUSTICES.

Of the practical results of the trial-justice system, as heretofore administered, I hear but one opinion, namely, that it is costly, inefficient, and oppressive.—Inaugural address, 1874.

SUFFERING CITIZENS.

No injury can be so great as that which we now witness in our citizens who have worked for the State, or lent their money on credit, and are now waiting and suffering because the State made appropriations when she had no funds with which to redeem her promises.—Letter to Senate Committee, February 15, 1875.

COUNTY RASCALITY.

I am confident that there is not one county in this State in which money enough has not been collected by taxation to pay every dollar of legitimate expense in maintaining the government of the country.—Veto of Edgefield resolution, February 24, 1875.

THE FLOATING DEBT.

I was persuaded that the State had the right, and that her condition demanded that she should postpone settlement until she could recover from the effects of a long course of extravagance and profligacy in the expenditure of public funds and the contracting of public obligations.—Veto of Bonanza bill, March 17, 1875.

THE COVER OF VAST FRAUDS.

That certificates for legislative expenses have been made the cover for vast frauds no man will dispute. They are universally regarded as the last culminating evidence of a prevailing system of corruption which has disgraced our State and offended the nation.—Veto of Bonanza bill, March 17, 1875.

BROKEN PLEDGES.

The party has ever been going into campaigns promising retrenchment and reform and never performing it.—Interview May 24, 1875.

DISAPPOINTED PLUNDERERS.

The plunderers in the last Legislature were greatly disappointed. For the first time in their official lives they had to go home without having made anything but their salaries and a little minor picking.—Interview May 24, 1875.

THE SALE OF VOTES.

A very large number of the members of the South Carolina Legislature come to the capital for the purpose of selling their votes and making all they can out of the office.—Interview May 24, 1875.

REFORM ABSOLUTELY NECESSARY.

Reform, if it was not of itself right, has become absolutely necessary, or the State will sink. Matters cannot run for six years to come as they have for the past six years. * * * From the contingent funds alone, in the past six years, there has been taken the astonishing sum of $376,832.74. One-fifth of that sum would have been ample; the rest ought to be put down to stealage.—Interview May 24, 1875.

STEALING, PURE AND SIMPLE.

The last six sessions, up to the time I was inaugurated, cost the State, under the head of "legislative expenses," the enormous sum of $2,147,430.97. These figures, I may say, are unparalleled in the history of American legislation. It is stealing, pure and simple.—Interview May 24, 1875.

ENORMOUS AND DISGRACEFUL FIGURES.

The average expense of the attachés and contingencies of the South Carolina Legislatnre per session has been $258,424.65, and these enormous and disgraceful figures represent only the actual payments made.—Interview May 24, 1875.

THE BIGGEST STEAL OF ALL.

The cost of printing and advertising for six years was $1,104,569.91. * * * And what has the State to show for it? Absolutely nothing! For three years, 1871, 1872, and 1873, printing and advertising cost the State * * * about one thousand dollars a day. And this in a State the entire taxable wealth of which is less than many single counties in the North.—Interview May 24, 1875.

A FARCE AND A FRAUD.

The duties of a trial justice here are precisely the same as the duties of justice of the peace in other States. Yet previous governors had appointed and commissioned over two hundred men to the important duties of this office who could not write or read a word of the English language. It was a farce and a fraud; for how can men thus ignorant intelligently try causes, civil and criminal, brought before them?—Interview May 24, 1875.

CANDID CONFESSION.

No man will dispute that our State needs reform in nearly every department of the public service.—Speech in Charleston, November 4, 1875.

PUBLIC MONEYS WASTED.

Our public moneys are largely wasted, and that is worse even than the burden of taxation.—Speech in Charleston, November 4, 1875.

A GLARING EVIL.

Every person who looks to the State for salary or pay is now, and has been for years past, obliged to accept such part only of what is due him as may be realized from taxes which are due him, with a certainty that he will at best receive only a part. In the case of public institutions the evils are still greater.—Veto of the supply bill, November 23, 1875.

A TRAVESTY.

What a travesty it is to see men filling the office of school commissioner, to pass upon the qualifications of school teachers, when they can barely write their own names.—Speech February 2, 1876.

BLACK THURSDAY.

The conspiracy (for the election of Moses and Whipper) appears to have been carefully concocted. The color line, the party line, and the line of antagonism, to my astonishment, all were sharply drawn. * * * I look upon their election as a horrible disaster. * * * This calamity is infinitely greater, in my judgment, than any which has yet fallen upon this State, or I might add, upon any part of the South.—Interview December 19, 1875.

CIVILIZATION IN PERIL.

The civilization of the Puritan and the Cavalier, of the Roundhead and the Huguenot, is in peril. Courage, determination, union, victory, must be our watchwords. The grim Puritans never quailed under threat or blow. Let their sons now imitate their example.—Telegram to New England Society of Charleston, December 22, 1875.

A THRILL OF HORROR.

Their election (i. e., of Whipper and Moses) has sent a thrill of horror throughout the State. It has split the republicans in twain.—Letter to Senator Morton, June 13, 1876.

THE DOOM OF RADICALISM.

No party can rule this State that supports Whipper and Moses. * * * There is but one way to save the republican party in South Carolina, and that way is to unload Moses and Whipper, and all who go with them. * * * Neither the Administration at Washington, with all its appliances, civil and military, nor all the denunciations of the world heaped upon me can save the republican party here from overwhelming defeat during this year, unless we can persuade the people of this State that such things as these judicial elections will be undone, and never by possibility be repeated.—Letter to Senator Morton, June 13, 1876.

In Mr. Chamberlain's own words, the people read the horrible tale of the extravagance, fraud, and profligacy which have "disgraced our State and offended the nation." Out of the mouth of its chosen chieftain is the party judged. When Governor Chamberlain spoke and wrote the burning phrases that now come back to plague him he was fighting with might and main the roguish crew who now, for the second time, surround and support him. They are the men who "go with Moses and Whipper." They are the conspirators who planned and carried out the horrible work of Black Thursday. They are the band who go to Columbia to sell their votes and who revel in legislative plunder. The party cannot "unload them," for they are "the party," now that Mr. Chamberlain consents to lead them. And upon that party we invoke the doom that Governor Chamberlain foresaw; "the overwhelming defeat during this year" that he predicted.

Mr. BUTLER. I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of executive business, and ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ANTHONY, (when his name was called.) I am paired to-day with the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. HILL.]

Mr. BUTLER, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON.]

Mr. McDILL, (when his name was called.) I am paired on this question with the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. GORMAN.] If he were here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. ROLLINS, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. VOORHEES.]

Mr. MAHONE. Mr. President, I desire to submit a resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia submits a resolution, which will be reported for information.

Resolved, That the Attorney-General be directed to transmit to the Senate a copy of the answer of Hon. John F. Lewis, United States marshal for the western district of Virginia, to the report of C. C. Lancaster, acting special agent of the Treasury Department.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. What disposition does the Senator from Virginia ask in respect to the resolution?

Mr. ANTHONY. I am paired on political questions with the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. HILL.] Although this is simply a motion to adjourn, I judge from the responses that it has assumed a political aspect, and therefore I do not vote.

Mr. KELLOGG. I vote for the purpose of making a quorum. I vote "yea."

Mr. ROLLINS. I reserved the right to vote if there was no quorum. Is there a quorum?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks not.

MONDAY, May 2, 1881.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Thursday last was read and approved.

OFFICERS OF THE SENATE.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business of the last day's session, being the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] providing for the election of certain officers of the Senate, the pending question being on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] to postpone the resolution indefinitely, upon which motion the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. FARLEY. Mr. President, before making the motion which I am about to make, I desire to state that the Senate has now been in session for nearly two months; and the records of the Senate will show that the democratic side of the Chamber have been endeavoring to proceed to the consideration of the business for which we have been called together. If reports are true as to what is on our Secretary's desk, and if we are to know what we see go there daily, there is a very large number of appointments now pending and awaiting consideration. Treaties are before this body for either rejection or ratification. The other side of the Chamber have universally from the commencement of this session retarded the progress of the business for which the Senate has been convened.

I again ask that Senators consider the appeals that are daily being made from different portions of the country. From my own State men of both parties and citizens irrespective of party are appealing to the Senate to consider important matters in which the people of that State are directly interested. Petition after petition, recommendation after recommendation is daily coming from the public press of California asking for the consideration of the Chinese treaties. In one of the papers published a few days ago I observed a statement that I had been the means of retarding the consideration of the Chinese treaties before the Senate. The records of the Senate contradict that statement, and the records are better evidence than——

Mr. DAWES. I call the Senator to order. Whatever the records of the Senate touching any unratified treaty may show, it is a matter upon which the Senator cannot comment in open session.

Mr. FARLEY. I am not, as I understand the rules, violating any of the rules of the Senate. I am not stating what took place in executive session; I am not stating what will take place in executive session.

Mr. DAWES. In order that the Senator may understand to what I alluded, I will state that it was this remark: he said that he had seen in the public prints a statement that he had been the cause of delay in the ratification of the Chinese treaties, and that the records of the Senate would show the contrary. Whatever has been done with an unratified treaty, whether it has been delayed or otherwise, has been done in executive session; and whatever the records of the Senate may show pertaining to any unratified treaty, they are the records of executive session. Whether the Senator has been the cause of the delay in the confirmation of any treaty or not, relates to what the Senate has done in executive session; and what the records of the Senate will show, whether in confirmation or in contradiction of his present assertion, they will show, and show only, what is done in executive session. Therefore any statement of the Senator that he has done or omitted to do anything touching an unratified treaty, or any statement of the Senator of what the records of the Senate will show as to what he has done in that regard, are statements of what must have transpired in executive session and nowhere else.

Mr. FARLEY. Still, sir, I do not conceive that I was outside of the rules of the Senate in making the statement which I did make. I said papers had alleged so and so. I have not referred or attempted to refer to anything that occurred in executive session, I have not intimated in any way what took place in executive session; I have no right to do so.

Mr. DAWES. What does the Senator mean, then, when he says that he has not done anything to delay action upon an unratified treaty?

Mr. FARLEY. The Senator will permit me to get through with my remarks, unless I am out of order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from California will proceed in order.

Mr. DAWES. Does the President of the Senate rule that the Senator from California has a right to comment on what must have transpired in executive session?

Mr. FARLEY. I am not commenting on what transpired in executive session.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair does not understand that the Senator is commenting on proceedings in executive session.

Mr. FARLEY. It is my misfortune whenever I attempt to say anything, no matter how brief my remarks may be, to be generally interrupted by my distinguished friend the Senator from Massachusetts. I have no right to state what occurred in executive session. I can state what did not occur in executive session, and violate no rule governing the consideration of executive business. I say that this side of the Chamber for nearly two months have endeavored, day after day, to get into executive session to consider the public business which has been referred to the Senate for consideration. A part of that public business is the consideration of treaties. It is a public fact that there are treaties pending before the Senate, and among those most notable are the Chinese treaties.

I have gone further. I have stated on the floor of the Senate and asked that side of the Chamber even to go into executive session and consider those treaties, and then if they desired to keep up this contest for the mere election of a few officers, they could return to their fight and continue it, but that has been refused by the republican side of the Chamber continuously.

I notice in the papers this morning that even my colleague, [Mr. MILLER,] who acts with the republicans on the other side of the Chamber, is appealed to by the people of California to consider these questions. So far as this side of the Chamber is concerned there are no appeals made to us. Why? Because the records and every day's Journal show the fact that we are persistently endeavoring to get into executive session to consider the business for which we have been called together; but it seems that the republican side of the Chamber deem the election of my friend, Mr. Gorham, as Secretary of the Senate of more importance than the consideration of the Chinese treaties or any other business of the Senate. Such the records will show.

I see daily in the newspapers that from eight hundred to a thousand Chinamen are semi-monthly arriving in the city of San Francisco. One ship with nine hundred Chinamen, in quarantine to-day, has brought in the small-pox and the other evils from that country that come with this population. It is lying to-day in the harbor of San Francisco. I do not say what action will be taken upon the Chinese treaties; but our people are protesting against the neglect, the apparent neglect, on the part of the Senate, and for that neglect the republican party is responsible.

I hope that the Senate will consider this matter and proceed to the consideration of executive business without any further delay. The mere election of a Secretary of the Senate is not demanded by any of the necessities of the Senate. We have already a Secretary; we have a full organization. If the election of Mr. Gorham as Secretary of the Senate is of more importance than preventing this influx of a population on the Pacific coast that is destroying the best interests of the State, driving the laboring classes of the people out of it and starving them, then I say continue your efforts in that direction and be responsible for the result. We are not responsible on this side. We have urged the proper course for nearly two months, and yet the solid vote of that side of the Chamber has been against the consideration of this question.

Mr. President, I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. DAWES. Will the Senator withdraw the motion for a moment, that I may make a few remarks?

Mr. FARLEY. I dislike to refuse anything of that kind, but I can hardly give way.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator will have an opportunity to renew the motion, of course, when I am through.

Mr. FARLEY. Will you renew it?

Mr. DAWES. I will not renew it. Will you withdraw the motion for a moment?

Mr. FARLEY. Certainly I may renew it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Senators will address the Chair.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator of course knows that I cannot renew it; the Senator will not take that as any offensive remark.

Mr. FARLEY. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. DAWES. I was about to say, Mr. President, that whatever may be the ruling of the Chair in reference to the latitude in which other Senators may indulge in discussing in open Senate subjects that the rules require to be considered only in executive session, and whatever may be its ruling as to the propriety of any Senator indulging in remarks about his own course in executive session, I shall endeavor to conform to what has always seemed to me to be the ancient custom of the Senate, and discuss in open session only those subjects which belong to an open session. I will say that whatever anxiety there may be on the part of any Senator to go into executive session for the consideration of executive business of any character, that Senator is not more anxious than I am for the reaching of that end, and whatever appeals he may make to the record of the last two months will disclose that he and those who act with him have been solely responsible for any delay in going into executive session. That Senator will find the records to show that he and those associated with him have resorted to every device known to parliamentary law to prevent the transaction of the business of the Senate——

Mr. FARLEY. Will the Senator allow me to ask him one question?

Mr. DAWES. In one minute. In that business of the Senate is included and inseparably with it is connected all that pertains to the transaction of executive business. Now I will yield to the Senator.

Mr. FARLEY. I simply rose for the purpose of asking the Senator a question, and that is, has not this side of the Chamber proposed time and again to go into executive session for the purpose of considering executive business, and saying to our friends on that side of the Chamber "after considering the important matters for consideration in executive session you can return to open sessions and carry on your contest for the election of these officers?" I ask the Senator if that proposition has not been made by myself three or four different times?

Mr. DAWES. If the Senator and those who act with him will stop making dilatory motions for one hour to-day——

Mr. FARLEY. That is not answering my question.

Mr. DAWES. For one hour to-day, this second day of May in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and eighty-one, at one o'clock this afternoon, he will be gratified, and we can go into executive session and transact the whole business that exists in executive session, without any allusion in open session to business the discussion of the merits of which belongs to executive session.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. DAWES. In a moment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts consent to being interrupted?

Mr. DAWES. The moment I get well on and half finish a sentence, I am interrupted by one or two of my friends.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts declines to yield the floor.

Mr. DAWES. Sir, it is because the Senator and his associates know that the resort to the motions they make is to prevent the transaction of the business of the Senate and is to prevent arriving at that point which can be arrived at in half an hour, that he makes them. He knows the shortest way to reach anything in executive session just as well as the wisest man in the Senate, and that is himself. He knows and those who act with him know that they can accomplish that which they affect now to consider to be the all-absorbing question, in the shortest possible way known to parliamentary law, if they will resort to it. Whatever is of special interest to the distinguished Senator from California in executive session or anywhere else, might have been long since disposed of. After it was submitted in January he and his party had a commanding majority of ten in this body for two long months, and it was in their power to have finished it up. If any evil has resulted from delay, if anybody is hurt, if anybody's wings have been broken and he is seeking to repair damages, he may lay it at his own door and not at the door of the republican party, who here and now tell you that all that he and his associates have done in the way of postponement to their damage on the Pacific coast or anywhere else in two long months while they had command, can be repaired instantly in half an hour if they will stop dilatory motions. Coming here in the name of a motion to go into executive session——

Mr. FARLEY. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. DAWES. In a minute.

Mr. FARLEY. I have as a rule invariably yielded to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. DAWES. I beg the Senator's pardon; I do not wish to keep him waiting.

Mr. FARLEY. The Senator has a very happy faculty, however, when he is asked to yield, of continuing to say he is not through with his sentence, and then he goes on to make about twenty or thirty other sentences before he gives way.

Mr. DAWES. Very well; I will yield.

Mr. FARLEY. It will not do for the Senator from Massachusetts to say that the democratic party have had it in their power to act upon this question. I am not at liberty to state what took place in reference to the Chinese treaties in executive session. The Senator from Massachusetts had no right to refer to the action of the Committee on Foreign Relations two months ago upon that question. In addition to that, the Senator from Massachusetts knows very well that for the last few days of the last session, when the democratic party had the power in the Senate, his side of the Chamber refused to go into executive session to consider executive business. So all of this talk in trying to shirk the responsibility from the party to whom it justly belongs will not be satisfactory to the people of my coast.

In addition to that, I say that both parties in the State of California to-day are protesting against the action of the Senate in prolonging the business, and they are protesting against the very men whom you have nominated here for the offices. Both sides of the question are discussed there by the public prints. There is not a republican newspaper of prominence in the State but denounces the action of the Senate and denounces the proposition to elect Mr. Gorham and Mr. Riddleberger officers of this body. The leading republican papers of that State do it—the Sacramento Union, the Argonaut, the Spirit of the Times, all the leading papers, and they are every one republican papers. The leading papers of the State denounce it and say that we should proceed to the consideration of business here, and yet the Senator gets up and thinks that this statement of his will be a sort of amelioration to the people of that State. He is mistaken in the character of the people who live in California.

I demand to-day, at least I ask, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the treaties for the reasons that I have stated; and I say that the republican party cannot escape the responsibility of the evils that have befallen our people if those evils have been brought about by reason of non-action on the part of your side of the Chamber.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator complained of an impatience on my part for giving him an opportunity to put an interrogatory. The Senate can understand the difference between a willingness to let a Senator put an interrogatory and to let a Senator insist upon making a speech when I am making one.

The Senator says deliberately, and in just as plain terms as he can without violating the rules of the Senate, what is the trouble with him. There has come to be an impatience upon the Pacific coast that he is trying to parry here. There has come to be an outcry on the Pacific coast that there are hundreds and thousands of Chinese coming to that shore under unrestricted treaty stipulations, which must be stopped; and yet the Senator stands here and tells the people of California that rather than have a democratic Secretary of the Senate displaced he will let them come and bring all the evils they please. He knows that so far as any prospective restrictions are concerned, he could stop the influx in an hour if he did not care more for a democratic Secretary of the Senate than he does for all the Chinese on the Pacific coast, for all the outcry against Chinese emigration upon that coast, and for all his desire to ameliorate the condition of his people. Sir, he will have to answer to his people for choosing between a democratic Secretary of the Senate and such treaty stipulations as he desires. He will have to answer that. He will have to answer their question: "Why did you not elect as the Senate desired the Secretary it pleased, and then go to the consideration of those treaty matters which are of such vital interest to us?" He will have to answer, why he chose to cling to a democratic Secretary of the Senate and let all the evils of Chinese immigration roll over his State. That is one question he will have to answer, and the other question he will have to answer is this: "When for two long months you had the power, when there was no question of whether a democratic Secretary of the Senate should continue in power or not, when there was nothing in the way, why did you not secure for us on the Pacific coast that which is dearest to us and that which is of more consequence to us as we understand it than the question of all the officers of the Senate of the United States?" This is the language that will come up to him when he goes back to his constituents. "Do you understand that when you had the power for two long months you did your duty by not raising your voice for action in the Senate of the United States upon that which is of such consequence to us? Do you understand that afterward you got up in the Senate of the United States in open session time and again and told us and the country that you would stand by a democratic Secretary of the Senate till the crack of doom, whatever might be the consequence to us on the Pacific coast; and that you have indulged in dilatory motions and have made half of them yourself, when you have been told by the Senate that if you would forego them one-half hour you could have all the action desired by and most dear to us?" These are questions that the Senator will not answer; and now at this late hour, coming in at the death, coming in at the last chance, he utters this dying malediction upon the Senate itself, when he has had it in his power to have accomplished all long since.

Mr. FARLEY. I asked the honorable Senator from Massachusetts a short time ago to answer a question.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator——

Mr. FARLEY. I am not going to give way for him to answer it now, because if he gets the floor he may probably keep us until day after to-morrow; but I will repeat the question I asked him to answer. The Senator speaks of coming in at this dying hour. I do not know who is going to die—whether that side of the Chamber intends to be clothed in mourning or not.

Mr. DAWES. One would suppose you had a painful consciousness of that truth.

Mr. FARLEY. If I had I should certainly keep it to myself. I do not think I should make it public so that my friends would mourn in advance.

Mr. DAWES. There is nothing so good for the soul as confession.

Mr. FARLEY. The question I asked the honorable Senator was whether I had not time and again—not at the last dying moment but time and again since we have been in session here for the last two months—made the proposition over and over again to go into executive session for the purpose of considering executive business, and among the business to be considered were the Chinese treaties? Time and again I put the question to the Senators whether they would not even do that and then come back and go on with the contest which they were making, if they wished to continue it.

I have a very great regard for my republican friends in California. I have a very large number of republican friends in that State and they are almost universally protesting against the election of the gentleman named by you as Secretary of the Senate. The republican party of California through its press is protesting against the election of Mr. Gorham as Secretary of the Senate, against whom I have nothing to say. Yet that side of the Chamber knowing these protests, as I suppose they do, from their own party in that State, have kept back the business which we should have considered, and for the sole purpose of carrying out the programme which they laid down for themselves, to elect officers of the Senate who were not demanded by the exigencies of the time or by any necessity whatever pertaining to the Senate. Now I think that the republican party on that side of the Chamber have come to their senses, and the dying that my friend from Massachusetts has referred to, over whom the mourning will have to take place, will be on that side of the Chamber, not on this.

Mr. DAWES. I may not quite have done the Senator justice when I said that he had deliberately chosen between his attachment to a democratic Secretary of the Senate and a desire to do for the people of California that which they thought was nearest to their interest. The Senator qualifies it now and says it is not only attachment to a democratic Secretary but it is hatred of a republican candidate also. I accept that, and I tell the Senator that I will help him make clear his statement to-day to the people of California.

Mr. FARLEY. We have heard the same statement from that side of the Chamber for the last two months.

Mr. DAWES. I do not see that that gives the Senator any occasion to interrupt my remark. He has stated that he has another reason besides his desire to keep a democratic Secretary in the Senate, and that is the opposition among republicans and others in California to the candidate of the republicans. Therefore, I say that he has deliberately chosen and now here in open Senate has avowed what has been behind him since last January, and that is not only a determination that there shall continue a democratic Secretary of the Senate, but also with it hatred of a republican candidate.

Mr. FARLEY. The Senator will allow me one moment. I have not said that there was any ill-feeling or any hatred on my part toward the candidate of the republican party for Secretary of the Senate. I have not said that, and the honorable Senator I hope will put me right on that proposition. I have not said that the object of Senators on this side of the Chamber was to keep a democratic Secretary of the Senate. I have said that we were opposed to the proceedings that the other side had taken to change the officers of the Senate; that was all. I have not mentioned the words "democratic Secretary" at all. I referred to the feeling of the people on the Pacific coast because I get information in reference to that question every day and from the leading newspapers of the republican party of my State.

Mr. DAWES. Now, Mr. President, I did not mean to say that the Senator had any personal hostility to the republican candidate. It was a political hostility; it was a political hatred I spoke of. We are talking here of the political relations of the two sides of this Chamber, and not of any personal animosities. I hope they do not exist. They do not exist on my part, and, so far as I know, they do not exist on the other part. It is a great political conflict that we are engaged in, and the Senator says that two things have operated upon his mind, and I do not intend to let him go from it, nor do I intend to be so unkind as to refuse him what aid I have to make it clear to the people of California why it is since last January they have been crying out for what seemed to them so vital. The period is divided into two parts. In one of them the Senator and his friends had absolute control, but for reasons satisfactory to them not a single Senator touched his harp or piped his lute in behalf of that great plan which is to bring salvation to California—not one of them, not one of them. The next is this session when the Senate determined that it would proceed to the election of a republican officer as Secretary of the Senate. It is suggested to me to put this interrogatory to the Senator: whether in open session the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations in the last Congress did not at the personal request of the Senator himself postpone a motion to go into executive session?

Mr. FARLEY. As the question has been asked of me——

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. HARRIS in the chair.) Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. DAWES. Certainly.

Mr. FARLEY. I am entirely ready to answer the question. As to what took place in open session the records of the Senate will show. The Senator says that this side of the Chamber have had since last January to consider the Chinese treaties. It is true that some time in February, I believe, the Committee on Foreign Relations did report the treaties back to the Senate; but from that time until the close of that session opposition from that side of the Chamber was made to going into executive session. I have no recollection—if I did the records will show it——

Mr. DAWES. I did not mean to say——

Mr. FARLEY. One moment; I shall adopt some little of your tactics. I have no recollection of asking the Senator who reported those treaties to postpone moving to go into executive session. I may have done so. If I did in open session the RECORD will show that fact. I am not positive about it; I am not prepared to answer. If I did, however, it was for the purpose of giving myself and the Senators from the Pacific coast and others with whom I consulted an opportunity to examine the treaties more fully than we had then done.

I now say that the Senator from Massachusetts will not be able to escape the judgment of the people of California in reference to this matter. There is a widespread public opinion there that the honorable Senator from Massachusetts and his colleague and other Senators on that side of the Chamber are opposed to interfering with the immigration of Chinese to the Pacific coast. Whether that is true or not, time will develop; but I say that in place of the position that he has assumed for this side of the Chamber, he will not escape it before the people. The people there will not believe that there is a democrat or republican from the Pacific coast but what is in favor of considering this question. The republicans and democrats are united on that coast in opposition to Chinese immigration; but on this side of the mountains unfortunately they do not believe all their allies entertain the same opinion that they do on this important question; and this proceeding of yours for two months past in preventing the consideration of these treaties will have its effect with both parties on that coast. I care not how often the Senator from Massachusetts may say that it is for the purpose of making a democratic Secretary of the Senate that this side of the Chamber has retarded action upon matters pending before the Senate. That will not (in California parlance) take with those people; they will not believe it because the records show differently.

But the Senator has a happy faculty of putting words in the mouth of a Senator that he never uttered. I say that we have endeavored time and again to secure the consideration of this business, and you have prevented it, and I proposed even a compromise, not a bargain and sale, not a purchase, but a compromise, to consider these treaties and then come back into open Senate and go on with your little contest about making two or three officers of the Senate, and you refused that. I appealed to my colleague on one occasion to even come out from among you on that question, knowing the sentiments of that people, and act with us on this side, and get into executive session, and then come back and continue your fight for the officers if you so desire.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator has not answered yet whether he made that request——

Mr. FARLEY. I have made the only answer I could make.

Mr. DAWES. Of the chairman of the committee to postpone making the motion to go into executive session. The Senator says if he did it in open session the records will show it. Whether he did it in open session or privately I do not know. It is known to everybody that the democratic chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations justified his dilatory course during the last session to those anxious on this side for action on the matter to which the Senator has referred by the statement which I have made. Whether he made it in open session or made it otherwise I do not know.

But what, Mr. President, I want to call the attention of the Senator to is the vain attempt to satisfy the people of California that whatever merit there may be in the Chinese treaties they will be indebted to the democratic party for. Why, Mr. President, who made the treaties? To which party are the people of California indebted for whatever merit there may be in them? To whom are they indebted for the fact that they are not the supreme law of the land to-day? Those two things are quite enough for the Senator from California to occupy his mind about until that day shall come when he and his party prefer action upon those treaties to their adherence to a democratic Secretary of the Senate.

Sir, the Senator gets off by talking about some happy faculty that this poor unfortunate individual has. Why, sir, if he had half the happy faculties which the Senators on the other side have done him the honor to clothe him with, he would be a considerable person. Sir, I have but one faculty at this time, and that is to go straight to the business of this Senate, close to the door of which the Senator from California knows lies first that which he assumes here before the public he is so anxious to attain. He knows that he has spent in trying to induce the Senate to entertain one more dilatory motion time enough to bring him and his party where they cannot escape action upon that matter dear to his people which his side of the Senate have prevented them from reaching since last January. He knows that he spent——

Mr. FARLEY. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. DAWES. In one moment. Let me repeat my remark, so that the Senator will know what it is. He knows that this happy faculty to which he alludes begins and ends with a dedication to the business of the Senate, to its order of business as the Senate shall have determined it, and he knows that he has spent this morning more time in inducing the Senate to entertain a dilatory motion than all the time necessary to bring him and his reluctant side of the Senate where they would be compelled to say "yea" or "nay" upon a matter which his coast deems vital, but which they cannot have because since last January for some reason or other he and his associates have delayed or prevented action upon it.

Mr. FARLEY. Mr. President, I do not intend to continue this. I am perfectly willing, so far as I am individually concerned, and so far as the democratic party is concerned, to let what the honorable Senator from Massachusetts may put upon the RECORD and what I may say or do be submitted to the people of California and to the people of the entire Pacific coast. I will take my chances on what the Senators from Massachusetts may say, and what I have said or may say, with those people. The Senator has universally avoided the question that I asked him; but the fact remains that I have from the commencement of this extraordinary session endeavored to get into executive session, and that I have even proposed, as I said a moment ago, to compromise with the Senators on that side and asked them to renew their fight after coming out of executive session in regard to their officers. The reasons which I assigned were that these treaties were important to our people and that it was necessary to have them considered. As to the effort to go back to last January, the records of the last session of the Senate will show that for the last two weeks of the session, or nearly that length of time, the republican party resisted going into executive session, and the honorable Senator from Massachusetts himself was one who refused on one occasion all night, from early one day until the following morning, to go into executive session if he was present on the floor of the Senate. At all events that side refused to vote and kept us from going into executive session to consider the executive business, among which were these treaties.

I heard the honorable Senator say that at this time we were endeavoring to shirk the responsibility. Oh, Mr. President, that will not succeed with the people of my State. They know that Senators on this floor, both republicans and democrats, have their views upon the question of Chinese immigration, and they know that my honorable colleague and myself do not differ in sentiment in reference to this important issue which our people are most interested in. They know that fact; and yet my colleague has been tied up, I do not know by what means. I remember a few months ago whenever any little matter was brought up in the Senate by Judge Thurman or any gentleman who came in from what was supposed to be a consultation, that the word "caucus" was rung from the other side of the Chamber day after day. Now I do not know that any caucus or any consultation or any other binding influence has been brought to bear upon my colleague who I know is in accord with me on this question. I know that he and I are agreed upon the matter at issue. I do not know what influences have prevailed with him and others who agree with us in regard to that matter in keeping this business back and preventing the consideration of it in executive sessions of the Senate.

I have nothing to say about caucus. I believe that a party caucus is right as a rule for members of a party; but it was a word that was upon the tongue of many Senators on that side of the Chamber for the last year—"caucus programme," "caucus arrangement," on this side was the constant complaint. Now, at this session, each State of this Union has been held up to public scorn and contempt by a review of its past acts. By your conduct you have kept the Government of the United States in a turmoil. Each State has been reviewed to show that this great Nation with a big N has many bad parts in it, and you are holding them up before the public to show that this nation is a corrupt nation, corrupt in South Carolina, corrupt in all the Southern States, corrupt in Massachusetts, corrupt in Maine. Such things have been presented here before the people; they are matters of record; they go to the world and will be received as proof that this is a corrupt country. Why? Because these Senators criminate and recriminate upon those questions and hold up to the country at large that this is a nation of corruption, if you please to call it a nation.

Now, Mr. President, for the sake of some other Senators who desire to speak, I shall take my seat, having said all I desire to say on the subject. I will simply add that the position of the Senator from Massachusetts and my own I am perfectly willing to have submitted to the people of my State. My position on the question is well known; and notwithstanding all that the Senator from Massachusetts may say, or all that any Senator, or all the Senators on that side of the Chamber may say, the people of the State that I have the honor of representing in part will not believe that any act of mine has had the effect or has had a tendency toward retarding the consideration of this important subject.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, I am tempted to say a word only because of the great desire expressed by the Senator from Massachusetts that the happy faculty might be given him to do something which, he seems to think, if he could do, would make him a great man; the happy faculty he so much desires in my judgment would be to enable him to look straight at questions as they really are. He has been charged, unjustly I know, with a certain obliquity of mental vision which he has developed painfully to-day in his intense desire to impress upon the people of the country that a motion to proceed to the consideration of executive business is a dilatory motion, and that our earnest desire to do what the President has called us together to do is trifling with the public business. Now, if he would only look at the facts as they exist, and as the people of the country see them, and as they will surely recognize them, he will come up to the full measure of what he indicates is all that is lacking to make him, as I hope he will be some of these days, a truly great man.

The amazing spectacle was presented to the American people at the last session of Congress, and is repeated now, of the opposition, the democratic party being one-half the Senate to-day, in the undisputed majority till March 4, standing up to and sustaining in all just measures a republican administration, the last one even, which was obtained as we thought by unfair means, as well as the present one which we admit was fairly elected, doing all that they asked us to do, and all the opposition to the proposed measures necessary for the public interest coming from their own party and political friends, who, while professing friendship, are refusing to give even a decent support to the men or the measures proposed by the administration they have placed in power and charged with public duties.

Look at the facts developed at the opening of this session. When the President sent his Cabinet to a democratic Senate we confirmed it at once. When he sent us the nomination of any officer whose appointment he deemed necessary for the good of the public service we did not hesitate, but confirmed it at once, having as you all know a democratic majority of four or five at that time; never halting, never hesitating when the public good was said to require prompt action. When gentlemen on the other side said they desired to have the committees placed in their own hands in order to transact properly the public business, and filibustered for two weeks under the lead of the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] to obtain them, we said, "All right; take them and go on with the public business." When they obtained them, what then? You said, "No, we will not proceed with the public business, our professions notwithstanding. We have determined not to do so till we change the officers of the Senate"—a thing never done before in an executive session except once under peculiar circumstances—"you must allow us to turn out all the officers we have now and reorganize the Senate with such officials as we shall indicate." For what? The Senator from Pennsylvania with his usual boldness came to the front and told us that far beyond anything connected with these officers was the result sought, namely, to turn over the State of Virginia to a new organization, known as readjusters or repudiators, call them what you will, which had been denounced by the leaders of the last administration as enemies of the honor and integrity of the country. Its distinguished Secretary of the Treasury, now in his seat in the Senate, dismissed or threatened to dismiss peremptorily all men connected with his Department in Virginia if they dared connect themselves with that organization. And yet that had to be done before public business could be considered. The far-reaching effect of that scheme has been developed on this floor to be to turn Virginia over to what are called the readjusters, to elect a supreme court which will decide the Riddleberger bill to be constitutional and send a Senator here accepting those views, which are ruinous to the integrity and prosperity of Virginia, in the place of my honorable friend, [Mr. JOHNSTON.] These things cannot be done with my consent, as I have repeatedly stated on this floor.

Twenty-one good reasons were given the other day by the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. BUTLER,] at least he thought them good, and I believe the country will think many if not all of them are, all of them showing that the present struggle reached far beyond the officers of the Senate and advising the country why we will not allow you to proceed with that arrangement. We have so stated in every variety of form, and have assumed the responsibility over and over again; but we have always said we will proceed with the public business, and why have we not gone on with it? I will tell you—you may think it impudent, but that is not important—I will tell these people in the galleries who are here anxiously listening and wondering at the so-called dead-lock that they might as well go home. You have never dared go into executive session because of the same personal divisions and quarrels among yourselves that embarrassed the last administration and now embarrass this. Important nominations are before you that you never have dared to face. Why not ask the Senator from Minnesota or the Senator from Virginia, who avow that they are responsible for two of your nominations, Riddleberger put forward if not nominated by Mr. MAHONE, and Mr. Johnson named by Mr. MCMILLAN. If you go into executive session and some important nominations that I could name, but will not, come up and either of those gentlemen votes against one of those nominations there will be no more patronage awarded to them from the Administration. If they vote for them then the stalwart, anti-administration republicans who are opposing these important nominations will see to it that none of the men they want to place in power shall ever hold the places you promised to give them, and if you lose either of these Senators your so-called "constitutional majority" is gone; hence you have never dared to face these responsibilities and embarrassments.

Therefore it is that a caucus committee of seven has been appointed—a council of safety, as I have heard it called on this floor—a body of men unknown to the Constitution and laws, dictating to and imposing upon the consciences of members. We have all heard it denounced by your leaders when we were in power and have heard it ding-donged in every variety of expression as anti-republican and dangerous to liberty, when we never used it as you are doing. Now your organ in this city has announced that you are going into executive session, so carefully guarding your action that you will allow no controverted nomination to be considered or voted upon; that the democrats are not to be allowed to take any part in confirming or rejecting nominations when you get there; that you have resolved to decide in secret council who shall be allowed to come before the Senate and who shall not, and we shall be required to sit with our arms folded. Although there are thirty-eight of us, as many as there are of you, (assuming Mr. MAHONE as being one of you,) you will settle these matters among yourselves to the extent that you dare, and determine the extent that you dare not, admitting that all objected to by any great man in the party shall go over, hoping, I suppose, to heal the breach among yourselves between now and the first Monday in December.

Yet we are now told that the country is to be advised and impressed with the fact that the democratic party is acting improperly, though it has sustained this Administration without asking any favors from it. So far as I know no man on the democratic side has asked any favors; not a single democrat has been nominated, and I hope not one will be. The democratic party, constituting one-half of the Senate, has sustained this Administration with a fairness, with an honesty of purpose unexampled, in order to carry on the public business in such manner as your Administration may think it ought to be carried on, more fairly, more honestly, more earnestly than any opposition ever did support any administration before under anything like similar circumstances.

And yet gentlemen on the other side, the professed friends of the Administration, the men who are obtaining for their friends all the offices, the men who have only to go to the Departments and express a wish in order to have it gratified, the men whose friends are holding or are to hold all the high places, dare not, although we invite them every day, proceed to the consideration and confirmation of their own nominations, but allow all the business of the country to go unconsidered and pretend that they cannot do it because of our dilatory motions. They hope to hoodwink the country by the clamor that we will not allow them to disorganize and reorganize the Senate in order to hold on to some one or more Senators without whose votes they cannot get along and retain their so-called majority.

The people of the country understand all these things, and no amount of sophistry can shut their eyes to them. It seems to me that in spite of the best aid that was ever given to an Administration by an opposition, that Administration is either overwhelmed by superior forces opposing it in the Senate, or because it has not the courage to carry out its own purposes, or because it has not friends on its own side who have confidence in it, that for two months all the business of the country has been delayed. Gentlemen, you are making a most miserable exhibit of weakness or cowardice, call it what you like, if you are in fact friends of the Administration you pretend to support. If in two months it can be so humiliated, in two years nobody will have a decent respect for it.

There is not to-day, I understand, a marshal in the District of Columbia. There are in all the States many vacancies in important offices; there are many important positions where the President honestly believes other men ought to be in power, so that the public business should be faithfully carried on, notably so in the Post-Office Department. All that we have ever asked on this side is that he shall name men who are honest, competent, and faithful, and he shall, so far as we are concerned, have the men he desires, and shall be held responsible for their conduct when they are placed in power. Yet the Senator from Massachusetts cannot see any propriety in our action in regard to any of these things. He sees nothing in all we do but obstacles to going into executive session, and yet he desires above all things that some happy faculty might be given him in order to enable him to see them. I have endeavored to show him in a very plain way that all he has to do is to look straight at the obvious facts and not seek to avoid them, because his caucus has ordered him to shut his eyes; not to seek to devise means and devices whereby he shall becloud his naturally fine intellect by trying to make the people believe that there is any other question behind all this. We would have had no dead-lock, if that is what you like to call it, but for your own troubles; you all know it, and the people in the galleries and in the country may as well understand it. That is all I desire to say.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, there is much that I admire in this combination of Senators to prevent the Senate from ruling itself. While combined together for this common purpose of defying the will of the Senate itself, it has nevertheless in its methods resorted to a system which, in some respects, commands my admiration. Each Senator has assigned him his particular part to play. Although combined together, as I say, to prevent the Senate from controlling itself, each Senator has his part to play. The distinguished Senator from Tennessee, now occupying the chair, [Mr. HARRIS,] performs his with a clearness and precision, and with an alertness that never fail to win my admiration. The Senator, with a dilatory motion upon his tongue, will get up and announce to the public his anxiety to proceed at this moment not only to the consideration of the public business but to that particular part of the public business that he wants to perform first whether or no, and rather than have that particular part performed whether or no, although his desire to proceed to the public business, and that particular kind of public business absorbs every other thought, he winds up by moving to postpone the further consideration of all business till the first Monday in December.

The distinguished Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK,] however—whose appearance led me to make this remark—has assigned to him the rôle of telling us that we are trying to do what we dare not do. He has communicated, if there was any foundation for it, more information to our side of the Chamber about what we were doing than any one of us ever dreamed of during the various sessions of this Senate for the last two months. He has announced this morning that an ecumenical council exists here. He has told us over and over again, as his contribution to this fight, that we dare not go into executive session. He has told us that we see a great gulf before us, and every Senator on this side for the first time begins to look to see if he can discover where it is, and startles back at the novel announcement that there is a great gulf before the Senate itself, the constitutional majority of this body, that it dare not approach. This is all news to us. Why, sir, if the Senator was one of the correspondents of newspapers that illumine some portions of this gallery at all times of day, not to say night, he would have been discharged long ago for misleading the readers of the public press, for letting his speculations run away with him. I admire a smart correspondent of a newspaper who can invent something that he can defy the world to contradict. During Mr. Buchanan's administration there was one that occurs to me now who, short of anything else to say, perfectly barren of any real ideas in his head, sat down deliberately at his table and announced that there was an actual physical fight this afternoon in Mr. Buchanan's Cabinet, and one man (naming him) got knocked down. The whole press of the country in a day or two came out telling him he was a liar, there was not a word of truth in it; but he announced in his paper, and I commend it to the Senator from Kentucky, that until Mr. Buchanan came out over his own signature and declared that there had not been any fight in his Cabinet he would never take it back, and he went down into history as the star performer in that profession. He is eclipsed entirely by my distinguished friend from Kentucky. No inventor of the age can hold place with my distinguished friend from Kentucky in his announcement that the Senate itself insists upon determining for itself its own course of proceeding because the Senate sees a great gulf before it that the moment it does proceed it will fall into!

Sir, when I thought there was a time that I could set the Senator right, when I thought there was a time that he was seeking after truth and was really desirous of knowing what was the truth, I told him in all kindness that I would give him an opportunity to demonstrate whether there was any truth in it in five minutes if he would let the Senate proceed to business, and he said he would not do it. He would rather live and die in his delusion than to be convinced of his error by proceeding to public business.

That is all I have to say to all that my distinguished friend from Kentucky has said.

Mr. BECK. One further suggestion, as I am giving you information. After one of the most earnest struggles to prolong this session a couple of weeks longer you will not have a quorum, and I believe you will succeed by the effort you are making in disclosing that fact.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I have taken very little part in the discussion that has taken place on this floor during the present session, and I should say nothing this morning except for the repetition by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] of what has been repeatedly stated in debate, that the democratic side of this Chamber is responsible for the delay in proceeding to the duty for which we were called together by the late President of the United States. I should perhaps not have taken the trouble to reply to the remarks of the Senator from Massachusetts on that point if he had been the only Senator who had given utterance to such an opinion, because the Senator from Massachusetts has so repeatedly made that assertion upon this floor that, in my judgment, it has ceased to have any effect either in the Senate or in the country. He, however, but repeats and reiterates what has been stated by other Senators, that the delay in proceeding to the consideration of executive business was the result of the action of the democratic Senators in this Chamber.

Now, sir, a complete refutation of all such charges is found upon the records of the Senate. We have more than seventy-five times invited the other side of the Chamber to proceed to the consideration of executive business, and the yeas and nays will disclose the fact that they have persistently, I had almost said obstinately, refused to consider the business for which this session was called. Yet in the face of that record it is repeated again this morning that the fault of the delay attaches to this side of the Chamber.

Let us look at the facts for a moment. We were called here nearly two months ago by the proclamation of the late President to consider such subjects and such matters as might be submitted to us by the incoming Administration. At that time we were in the majority in this Chamber; we had a clear and undisputed majority, and proposed immediately to proceed to organize the committees of the Senate so that the business sent to us by the Executive might be considered. Yet we were resisted; we were delayed by dilatory motions made by the other side for nearly two weeks until they supposed, by the aid of the vote of the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. MAHONE,] they were able to organize the Senate.

The moment it became apparent that the other side of the Chamber by the aid of the Vice-President would appoint the committees of this body, we permitted such organization in order that the public business might not be delayed. If we had deemed it proper, as we might very well have done, to have resisted the organization of the committees by the republicans, we should have been justified before the country, because there was no majority on the other side of the Chamber, and without the intervention of the Vice-President, who is not a member of this body in the proper acceptation of the term, there could have been no organization of the committees of this body by the republican side of the Chamber. But we were not factious, and we voluntarily put ourselves and them in a position where they could avail themselves of the vote of the Vice-President to appoint the committees of this body, and the committees of the Senate to-day are the appointees of the Vice-President, because there were thirty-eight members on this side of the Chamber voting against thirty-eight members on the other side in reference to the committees, and but for the intervention of the Vice-President you would have had no committees. We might have resisted that; we might have resisted meeting the question as to the committees, and prevented the interposition of the Vice-President at all in the appointment; but instead of doing that, in order that the public business might proceed, we voluntarily placed the Senate in such a position that the republican side of the Chamber could take advantage of the vote of the Vice-President and obtain the committees of this body.

We had hoped that when the committees were appointed the republican members of the Senate would proceed to the consideration of executive business; but what was our surprise when, after caucusing on the subject, the republican members of this body came forward with the proposition now pending before the Senate to proceed to the election of officers, accompanied by other resolutions to elect Mr. Riddleberger Sergeant-at-Arms and Mr. Gorham as Secretary of the Senate. I have no doubt that the republican side of the Chamber expected us to antagonize feebly this proposition. Doubtless they were acting under the impression that we had been so acquiescent in reference to the committees of the body, we would forego our objections, however strong they might be, to the appointment of new officers of this body and allow them to appoint Mr. Riddleberger and Mr. Gorham. I have no doubt they were very much surprised when they found a unity of purpose and a unity of action on the part of the democrats of the Senate in resistance to their programme for the change of the officers of this body. I shall hereafter, if I think it necessary, assign some reasons for our action; but I am now calling attention to what we have done in order that the public business might be proceeded with.

This resolution has led to six weeks' debate. The republican side of the Chamber, in order to justify their alliance with the readjuster party of Virginia, in order to justify the aid and comfort which they are giving to repudiation in this land, have seen proper to lead off in assaults upon the people of the Southern States, and to continue that line of discussion for nearly two months. The Senator from Massachusetts and his colleague opened these assaults upon the Southern States in order to justify their own alliance with the readjusters and with repudiation. They recklessly charge all manner of crimes against the people of the South. They charge them with the repudiation of their honest debts; they charge the people of the South with preventing free and fair elections; they charge them with the commission of crimes and outrages upon the negro population of that country, and they have revamped all the old stories that have been exploded years and years ago, and brought them into this Senate in order to justify their own act in allying themselves with repudiation and readjustment.

Now, Mr. President, I will not follow republican Senators into that field of discussion. For one I am willing that the past shall bury its dead, and that all those allegations of outrage and of wrong which for political purposes, and for political purposes alone, have been repeated in every campaign, shall be hushed into silence. I have none of the instincts of the jackal that preys upon the graves of the dead and exhumes and gnaws the bones that have been buried for years. I will not follow them into that field of debate, nor engage in crimination and recrimination against the States of this Union. The highest duty of patriotism and of statesmanship demands that whatever of animosity and bitterness was engendered by the war should cease. We are but one people; we have a common destiny, and every part of this country is interested, and deeply interested in that which affects other parts of the country; and I say to the Senator from Massachusetts, and to other Senators on the other side of this Chamber, that they cannot traduce the people of the Southern States or inflict injury and distress upon that portion of the country without committing a crime against the whole country. The States of this Union are inseparable in interest and destiny.

> In fortune and in name we're bound
> With firmer links than steel,
> And neither can be safe nor sound
> But in the other's weal.

Why, then, should our republican friends seek by this line of discussion to malign and injure any portion of this land? Do they not know that the injury they inflict must be shared by every other section of the country? I do not hesitate to say that the claims of patriotism forbid it. I do not hesitate to say that wise statesmanship forbids this continual aggressive assault upon the Southern States in order to produce political partisan effect. I shall not follow in such discussion, but I propose to answer very briefly and succinctly the charge which has been preferred against this side of the House that we are responsible for the delay in proceeding to executive business.

The Senator from Massachusetts who has charge of this resolution has persistently kept it before the Senate refusing to go into executive session in order to consider questions which were brought to our attention by the President, and, as I again repeat, the yea-and-nay votes of this Senate disclose the fact that for at least seventy-five times during the last two months that side of the Chamber has refused to consider the executive business sent to us by the President. Why, sir, you have on your table nominations for foreign ministers, for consuls to foreign ports, for judges upon the Supreme Court bench and other judicial positions, for collectors of revenue throughout the country, for governors of Territories, for marshals, for postmasters, for Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and I understand that the gentleman who has been named for Commissioner of Indian Affairs is today actually performing the duties, not as Commissioner, but he accepted by arrangement a clerkship in the office in order that he might enter upon the discharge of the duties of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, all because the other side of this Chamber refuses to take up the messages of the President and to give them a respectful consideration.

Now, the excuse for not doing this is that we are resisting the resolution to appoint a Secretary and a Sergeant-at-Arms and some other officers. Republican Senators make that the excuse for refusing to go into executive session. In the first place, I reply that there is no necessity for an election of officers, because we already have a Secretary, a competent Secretary; we already have a Sergeant-at-Arms, an executive clerk, and all the officers that they propose to elect; and we have men who, by the judgment of the republican members of the Senate, are fully competent to perform the duties of the positions to which they have been assigned. There is therefore no necessity for proceeding to the election of these officers.

Again I reply that it is contrary to precedent, that there never has been but one instance in the history of the Senate when at an executive session the officers of the Senate were changed. That, I believe, was in 1853, when a change became necessary because of the supposed disqualification of one of the officers, and the Senate went into an election in order to get clear of one officer of the Senate that was supposed to be incompetent from his habits to perform his duties and elected, as I understand, all the old employés except the man whom they did not desire to continue. I do not know whether that is the fact, but such is my information.

Because we object to the election of Mr. Riddleberger and Mr. Gorham it is asserted that we resist the will of the majority. Now, suppose we do, have we not a right under the rules of the Senate? Suppose we were found in resistance to the will of the majority of the Senate, while we keep within the rules of the Senate are we not justified in such resistance? Is there any statute of the land that we violate? Is there any constitutional provision that we violate? Is there any rule of the Senate that we violate by this motion that we make to go into executive session? Certainly, the other side of this Chamber, while they may contend that we resist the will of the majority, will not say that we have done it without keeping strictly within the purview of the rules of this body.

But now, Mr. President, I want to say once for all, I want to say it in the hearing of the other side of this Chamber, that I deny that the republican side of this Chamber has a majority of this body. We are equally divided, and there is no republican majority in this Chamber to-day, and never has been since the session began. How is the Senate composed? The Constitution determines who constitute the Senate. The Constitution provides that the Senate shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the Legislature thereof. That is the constitutional declaration as to the composition of the Senate; and now, sir, have we not an equal number of democratic Senators with you? How, then, can you affirm that you have "a constitutional majority?" You have no majority; you have but an equal number of votes. It is true that in a certain contingency, in the case of an equal division of the vote—a tie upon legislative questions—the Constitution invests the presiding officer of this body, the Vice-President of the United States, with the power to determine the question by casting his vote; but until that contingency arises, until the tie vote is reached in the Senate, there is no power in the Vice-President to cast any vote, and he has no more power over any question submitted to the Senate than the smallest page upon this floor. Your complaint is, gentlemen, that we on this side will not put you in a position where you may avail yourselves of the casting vote of the Vice-President. You have no right to complain of anything else. You have no numerical majority, but you are complaining that this side of the Chamber will not put you in a position where you can avail yourselves of the vote of the Vice-President. Well, now, sir, should we put ourselves in that position on a question of this character simply to gratify you? We know that your Vice-President would vote your behest; we know that to his vote you are not entitled until the contingency arises when he may vote, and we are perfectly justified in so conducting ourselves that you shall not avail yourselves of the vote of the Vice-President upon this question.

In making such a demand upon us you ask what you would not concede if the Vice-President was a democrat, and you must pardon us for refusing to concede to you an advantage to which you are not entitled.

We did put ourselves in that position in reference to the committees of the body. We did so because the appointment of committees was absolutely necessary in order that the public business might be proceeded with; but it must not be inferred because in a contingency of that kind we placed the Senate in a position where the Vice-President might vote that we are going to do that on other questions where it is not essential to the performance of the public business.

In reference to that vote of the Vice-President in the appointment of committees I entertained the opinion then, and I entertain it still, that the Vice-President had no right to cast that vote and to appoint the committees. I know I differ from other gentlemen on this side of the Chamber, as perhaps I do with gentlemen on the other side; but I hold now and repeat that in everything which pertains to the status of members of this body, the assignment of the duties of members of this body, the Vice-President has no more power than one of the pages upon this floor.

Would it not be monstrous to assert that the Vice-President may determine the status of any member of this body by assigning him without leave of the Senate to duty on a particular committee? The Constitution never contemplated that the Vice-President should cast any vote whatever on a matter affecting the status and services of Senators. I am not unaware that Mr. Fillmore when Vice-President, in reference to an officer of the body, did give a casting vote; but that was in the case of an officer of the Senate not a member of the body, and in that case Mr. Fillmore doubted his right to cast the vote and would not cast it except by direction or consent of the Senate, and that was in the case of a chaplain, a gentleman to come here and say prayers for the Senate in the morning. And yet upon a question of that character, totally distinct from the appointment of the committees of this body, Vice-President Fillmore refused, and did not exercise the right to give a casting vote until he had submitted the question to the Senate. The question was then not discussed fully, but opinions were expressed that he had a right to vote, and subsequently when no objection was made he cast a vote for chaplain; but it is a very distinct and different question from the appointment of committees of this body. The appointment of the committees of this body determines the status of members of the body; it assigns them to the duty they must perform as members of this body, and I am sure a fair construction of that provision of the Constitution which authorizes the Vice-President in the case of a tie to vote does not extend to a question of that character so vitally affecting the status and services of the members of this body.

But it is not my purpose to argue that question. It must not be inferred, however, because we yielded in that case and permitted the Vice-President, in order that the public business might be proceeded with, to give his casting vote, that in a case of this kind where there is no necessity pressing upon the Senate we are to yield our rights and place the other side of the Chamber in a position where it may avail itself of the casting vote of the Vice-President; we do not intend to do it. We have rights on this floor; we are your equals in numbers and supposed to be your peers in other respects, and we do not intend that you shall have the advantage of the vote of the Vice-President in reference to the appointment of officers of this body objectionable to us.

So the charge that we are resisting the will of the majority is wholly without foundation; it is unjustified in every aspect of the case, and the only complaint the other side can make of us is that we will not place ourselves in a position where they can avail themselves of the vote of the Vice-President to give them advantages to which they are not entitled.

We have heard it repeatedly from various Senators on the other side of the Chamber that we are resisting the Senate, that we are resisting the will of the majority of the Senate, when the facts of the case are that we are your equals in numbers and that we do not resist any constitutional majority whatever, and simply refuse to grant you the advantages of which you desire to avail yourselves by the aid of the Vice-President.

Mr. MORRILL. Will the Senator from Delaware allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SAULSBURY. Yes, sir.

Mr. MORRILL. When the Senator says they are our equals in number, does he include the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DAVIS,] now absent, who has voted with us steadily on this question of the officers of the Senate, giving our side, the republican side of the Senate, thirty-nine to thirty-seven on the other side?

Mr. SAULSBURY. The Senator from Vermont never was more mistaken in his life; the Senator from Illinois has never voted for Mr. Riddleberger or for your resolution to proceed with the election.

Mr. MORRILL. On every question except on going into executive session he is with us.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I beg the Senator's pardon; the Senator from Illinois is paired with one of your members on this very question today, as I understand, on going into executive session. He is ready to go into executive session at all times, anxious to go in, and not aiding you in the passage of this resolution.

Mr. MORRILL. The Senator from Delaware cannot have forgotten that the Senator from Illinois made a speech setting forth his platform, that the republicans having obtained the committees it was due to them that they should have the officers.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I remember the speech of the Senator from Illinois, and I remember the votes given by the Senator from Illinois while he was here. I remember the manly stand which he took in the Senate. While he was not a democrat, having been elected by democrats, he proclaimed in open Senate that he felt bound to cast his vote with the democrats because he had received the appointment of Senator from democratic members of the Legislature of Illinois. Sir, that Senator raised himself in the estimation of the country when he proclaimed his purpose to be true to the trust confided in him, and after having done so, he manfully declined to receive an appointment at our hands as chairman of the highest committee of this body.

So, then, I say this charge is wholly without foundation, yet it has been repeated time and again, and we have been held up before the country as resisting the will of the majority of this body. Why, sir, the people of this country are not fools. They understand throughout the length and breadth of this land this whole question as well as we understand it; they know full well that we are but exercising our rights, an equal number of democrats on this side of the Chamber opposing the same number of republicans on the other side of the Chamber.

But, sir, we have not only been charged with resisting the will of the majority, but it has been proclaimed and the charge has been made against the democratic members of the Senate that their action is revolutionary; we have been held up to the country as acting in a revolutionary manner. I believe it remained for the ingenuity of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] to proclaim that we were revolutionists. I think he was the first Senator on this floor who announced to the country that the democratic members of this body were engaged in a revolutionary proceeding. Since he made that announcement it has been reiterated by others on the other side of the Chamber. Coming from so high an authority as the Senator from Ohio, if the people of this country did not understand the true position of affairs in the Senate, it might carry with it some weight; but the people understand this question just as well as we understand it, and I say to the Senator from Ohio, though he stands high in the country, though he has had long service in the Senate of the United States, though he has been at the head of one of the most important executive offices in the country, though his name has been mentioned in connection with the highest executive office in this land, his charge against the democracy of being revolutionists, of being engaged in revolutionary proceedings, will do himself more harm, infinitely more harm, than it will do this side of the Chamber. The opinions of the Senator are not always correct, however high he may stand in the estimation of his countrymen.

He has had long service in this body, and the records of the Senate will disclose that on important questions the Senator from Ohio has sometimes been mistaken as well as the rest of us. I remember a few years ago, when he was Secretary of the Treasury, when the bill for the remonetizing of silver was before the Senate, that Senator lent his influence in opposition to that bill, gave discouragement to the passage of that bill, and predicted that its passage would have the effect to banish gold from this land; but history tells a different tale. The predictions of the Senator from Ohio have not been realized; the country has prospered, and the gold from foreign lands has flown into our coffers, and did so while he was Secretary of the Treasury, refuting his predictions and proving his judgment even upon a financial measure at fault.

Further back in the history of the Senate, when he was chairman of the Committee on Finance, I remember the anxiety and zeal with which he pressed the redemption of the greenbacks which his party in 1869, I think, promised the country; and his theory for the redemption of greenbacks was not to pay them in gold but to convert them into interest-bearing bonds at either 4 per cent, or 3.65 per cent. interest. That was his mode of financiering. He has the reputation of being a great financier; he is doubtless entitled to it; but then the greatest minds upon some questions may be mistaken, as the Senator from Ohio was on that occasion. His proposition was to convert a non-interest-bearing debt into an interest-paying security. That might have been well for the banks and other holders of the currency of the country; but it would have been sad for the people of this country, already burdened by taxation, to have had their taxes increased by the financial policy of the Senator from Ohio.

The Senator also has a political record as well as a financial record, and that political record is not a guarantee that his assertions now and charges that we are revolutionists and engaged in revolutionary proceedings are correct. The Senator was one of "the visiting statesmen" who went down to New Orleans in 1876. When he came back he indorsed fully the action of that returning board as being fair and legitimate; and yet the people of this country from that day to this have believed and known that no greater fraud was ever committed upon the elective franchise than was committed in Louisiana. The Senator from Ohio came back indorsing the action of that returning board and indorsing the character of the men who composed it. He declared on the floor of the Senate that Madison Wells was the peer and equal of any Senator on this floor; and yet the records of the Senate, a report made by one of the Senators from Massachusetts, declare the fact that Madison Wells made an affidavit charging fraud in one of the parishes in the State of Louisiana when the evidence proved that he was not in the parish at the time of the election and had not been for some time previous nor for some time afterward.

The Senator from Ohio gave his indorsement to the character of Wells and Anderson and the work of the returning board of Louisiana, and this fact shows that his judgment in reference to the action of this side of the Chamber should be taken with the allowance usually awarded to the opinions of fallible men.

I remember, too, in order to justify his approval of the doings of the returning board, that he held up in horror and with pathetic appeals the wrongs that had been done to Eliza Pinkston; and yet the records of the Senate, an investigation made by a committee of the Senate, disclose the fact that she was one of the most disreputable beings that ever lived, and that no reliance could be placed upon any statement which she made; in fact, that her statement in reference to the transaction which was held up before the Senate by the Senator from Ohio in such pathetic terms was a concocted scheme and a story made out of the whole cloth.

So when the Senator from Ohio arraigns this side of the Chamber as being revolutionists his opinions will be discounted because of the errors into which he has fallen in the past.

Why are we revolutionists? Are we violating any law? Are we violating any provision of the Federal Constitution? Are we violating any rule of this body? How, then, could it enter into the mind of the Senator from Ohio or of any other Senator to charge that we were engaged in proceedings of a revolutionary character?

One of the Senators from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR,] not to be outdone by the Senator from Ohio in his charges and allegations against this side of the Chamber, went a step further and charged that we were engaged in treasonable practices, guilty, I suppose, of compassing the overthrow of the Government, for that is what treason means.

I am aware that the Senator from Massachusetts subsequently sought to modify and parry the effect of the charge which he had brought against us, but I believe that he subsequently renewed the charge. Let me ask, what was the duty of the Senator from Massachusetts if we were engaged here in a treasonable attempt to subvert the Government? What was his duty as a Senator and what was his duty as a patriot and as a citizen? He ought to have taken proceedings immediately not only to have us expelled from the Senate because of treasonable practices, but the courts of the country should have been resorted to by the Senator from Massachusetts, and every man of us should have been held to account in the courts of the country for the commission of treason. Sir, what credit can be placed upon the assertions of gentlemen who will come here and, in the face of the country and in the face of the Senate and in the face of the facts that exist, charge the democracy with the commission of revolutionary and treasonable practices? The reckless charge of the Senator from Massachusetts needs no other comment, and his own subsequent reflection and mortification at his indiscretion will be a sufficient punishment for his temerity.

Now, Mr. President, we are justified in all that we have done. I repeat here that we are justified in resisting the passage of this resolution and the cognate questions connected with it. Why do I say so? I have already intimated that it was an unusual proceeding at an executive session; but I shall not place it upon that ground; I shall place it upon other considerations. I say to you, gentlemen, (and I want you to note what I say,) that in my judgment the proceedings which you propose will tend to the reproach of the Senate of the United States. I repeat that the proceedings which you propose will, if consummated, bring reproach upon the Senate of the United States, and we are bound, as members of this body, to preserve it as best we can from such misfortune. Why do I say that?

I am not going to charge that Mr. Riddleberger is not a competent man for the position for which he has been named. I do not say, because I do not know Mr. Riddleberger, that he is not a man of character and reputation. I shall make no such assertion, because I do not know Mr. Riddleberger. He may be eminently fit for the position, fully qualified to discharge its duties, and I therefore shall not take upon myself to denounce Mr. Riddleberger as wanting in qualifications for the position for which he is nominated. That is not the point. Nor shall I charge that he has been brought forward by reason of any bargain, for I know nothing personally of any bargain, and therefore shall not charge a bargain whereby Mr. Riddleberger has been brought before the Senate. That is not the point. Whether a bargain was made or not is not known to me, and unless I knew the fact I would not be justified in charging such a thing. My own opinions on this question it is unnecessary to give, and I shall not trouble the Senate with them; but I now want to call your attention, gentlemen, to another consideration. Whether there has been a bargain or not is not the question. Do the people of this country, or a respectable portion of the people of this country, believe that there has been a bargain? That is the question, because if such an opinion exists in the country, whether well founded or not, the election of Mr. Riddleberger would be accepted by those who thus believe as the consummation of a bargain, which, I repeat, would bring reproach upon this body, whose honor we are all bound to defend and maintain. It cannot be denied that such an opinion is abroad in the land; every Senator who at all reads the papers knows full well that the charge is repeated over and over again in every section of this country, not only in democratic papers but in independent papers, and I have understood—I have not examined sufficiently to assert it of my own knowledge—that in some of the republican papers such charges exist.

Now I say that with such an opinion or belief in the country, whether well founded or not, we as Senators cannot afford to do any act which in the judgment of those who entertain that opinion would bring reproach upon this body. I am not expressing an opinion that there has been any such bargain, but I am calling the attention of Senators to the fact that there is an opinion abroad in the land that such is the fact and that the election of Mr. Riddleberger will confirm that opinion in the minds of those who entertain it, and therefore would bring reproach upon this body. Now we as members of the Senate cannot afford to do any act, and our republican friends on the other side cannot afford to do any act that will degrade this body in the estimation of any respectable portion of the people of this country. Sir, there is not to-day entertained for the legislative branch of this Government the respect to which it ought to be entitled. The charges of corruption and of jobbery that have hung around the two Houses of Congress for years, the Credit Mobilier affair, the jobberies that have hung around this Capitol, as well as the corruptions that are known to have existed in some of the Executive Departments of the Government, have been well calculated to lessen the estimation of the people of this country for the Government under which we live, the law-making department of the Government as well as for the executive department of the Government. What do we read daily? That in one of the Executive Departments of this Government investigations are revealing the frauds that have been practiced upon the public service. Now I ask in all seriousness, can we afford as members of the Senate to do any act that will degrade this body and this Government in the estimation of the people of this country? The election of Mr. Riddleberger will have that effect, and I am only surprised that Senators on the other side have not apprehended this view of the question, have not realized that they will be held responsible for an act which is calculated in itself to bring reproach upon the body of which they are members.

Independent of that, leaving all these questions about bargains out of view, admitting, if you see proper, that there was no express or implied contract, no bargain of any character; admitting, if you see proper so to consider, that the public opinion to which I have referred is but mere suspicion and will fade away in a few days or a few months, still let me say to you, Senators on the other side of this question, that your position is giving aid and comfort to the repudiation of public debts. You have complained, unjustly perhaps, of the southern people that they have repudiated their debts. You have hurled that in their teeth and repeated it time and again, and will listen to no denial; and yet you are to-day seeking an alliance through Mr. Riddleberger and the Senator from Virginia with the readjuster party of Virginia for partisan purposes, and the people of this country will take note of the fact that while you are proclaiming honesty in the transaction of public affairs, while you are insisting upon the payment of all the public debt, you are giving aid and comfort to the readjuster party in Virginia and in other sections of the country by the position you occupy on this question, wholly inconsistent with your professions of fidelity to public obligations. I ask Senators to take notice of what will be the effect of their action. It has been avowed that their object was to strengthen the readjusting party of Virginia.

I am not sufficiently familiar with all the details of the readjustment movement in Virginia to designate it properly, but my understanding of the question is that it is a proposition to scale down and lessen the obligations of the State of Virginia to her public creditors, without their consent. If that is so, it is virtually repudiation; nothing more, nothing less; and yet the republican side of this Chamber, in the position which they have taken, are giving aid and comfort to an enterprise of that kind in the State of Virginia. It is seeking to strengthen a party which proposes to scale down the public debt of the State and to liquidate it without the consent of creditors for a less sum than has been heretofore agreed upon between the creditors and the State.

Gentlemen, you will be held accountable for your position on this question. You may hope to carry Virginia by such a process; you may have bright anticipations of success in some of the Southern States; but you will be disappointed. The people of the Southern States will understand the animus that moves you; they will not soon forget the chains you forged to bind them in the past; they will still cling with undying love to that party which, while a feeble minority in this body and in the other House, stood manfully up and contended for the rights and civil liberties of the people of the Southern States; they will still adhere to that party which, in the hour of their despondency and gloom, reached forth the right hand of fellowship and bade them hope, and they will not ally themselves with that party which, during all those dark days, sought to bind them in irrevocable chains of oppression and tyranny.

Let me say, in conclusion, to my republican friends, you are bringing upon the present Administration an odium from which it will not recover. You have embarrassed it already in the start. There never was an administration that came into power with brighter prospects of successful administration than that of the present Executive. Why, sir, people came from all sections of the country to witness the inauguration of President Garfield; the civil and military displays on the occasion were never equaled; an era of good feeling seemed to prevail; he came into power in the executive office with the kindliest feelings of his political opponents. Even our chosen leader in the last campaign, the competitor of President Garfield, honored his inauguration with his presence, indicative of that kindly feeling which the democracy entertained for a man they believed was properly and duly elected. We had for four years been writhing under the conviction that we had been cheated out of the Presidency, that the man who occupied the White House was there by the commission of the vilest fraud, and we welcomed the man, though he differed with us in politics, that we believed had a proper majority, and the democracy of the country all over this land hailed his advent as a relief from the rule of an Administration that had been imposed upon the country by fraudulent practices.

Two months of his administration have not expired, yet you have embarrassed the President by your course. His messages lie unopened upon your table. You have by your action complicated him to a greater or less degree on the question of repudiation. This Administration, so promising in the beginning, is losing the respect which was entertained for it thirty days ago. Let me tell you that if you connect the Administration with the doctrine of readjustment and repudiation, with the election of Mr. Riddleberger and the bestowal of Federal patronage upon the readjuster party of Virginia, the present Administration will go down as unhonored as its predecessor, and it or any other Administration ought to go down that allies itself with a faction that seeks by repudiation and readjustment to bring reproach upon the State of Virginia, or any other State of this land. I am not the guardian of President Garfield's administration, but it is an open secret that he has enemies in his own political household. He should be careful how he acts in this matter.

I am not sure that the Administration could now have one-half of its nominations confirmed except by the aid which it expects from the democratic side of this Chamber; but if this thing is to go on, if the power and patronage of the Administration is to be brought to bear to aid your purposes of strengthening the hands of the repudiationists and readjusters of Virginia and of the Southern States, for one I say unhesitatingly the Administration will not be worthy of my support if it suffers itself to be complicated with repudiation in any form or under any name.

Mr. President, I have detained the Senate longer than I intended. I did not know that I should occupy the floor to-day; but when I heard the Senator from Massachusetts reiterate again and again that which had been proclaimed heretofore, that we were resisting the Senate, that we were acting in a manner unbecoming Senators on this side of the Chamber, I felt impelled for one to give my reasons for the vote which I shall give now and at all times in opposition to the resolution before the Senate and the questions connected therewith.

Mr. HARRIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. VOORHEES in the chair.) The question is on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. HARRIS,] that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to have the yeas and nays on that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BURNSIDE, (when Mr. ANTHONY's name was called.) My colleague [Mr. ANTHONY] is paired with the Senator from Florida, [Mr. JONES.] If my colleague were here, he would vote "nay."

Mr. BURNSIDE, (when his name was called.) Upon this question I am paired with the Senator from Alabama, [Mr. MORGAN.] If the Senator from Alabama were here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. COCKRELL, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Maine, [Mr. FRYE.] If he were here, I should vote "yea" and he would vote "nay."

Mr. BECK, (when Mr. HALE's name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HALE,] who is absent for the day. I shall not announce the pair any more to-day.

Mr. JACKSON, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. HARRISON.]

Mr. SHERMAN, (when Mr. PENDLETON's name was called.) I am paired with my colleague, [Mr. PENDLETON.]

Mr. VANCE, (when his name was called.) I am paired on this and all other questions with the Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. VAN WYCK.]

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. I am paired with my colleague, [Mr. FAIR.] If he were here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. KELLOGG. I am paired with the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DAVIS.] If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. HAMPTON. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. BUTLER] is paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON.]

Mr. VANCE. I announced my pair with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. VAN WYCK] through mistake. The Senator from Nebraska was originally paired with the Senator from Oregon, [Mr. GROVER,] and to accommodate me in a recent absence the Senator from Oregon transferred his pair to me. He is now absent himself, and resumes his pair with the Senator from Nebraska. Therefore I vote "yea."

Mr. MITCHELL. I am paired with the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. LAMAR.]

The result was announced—yeas 21, nays 22; as follows:

So the Senate refused to proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. DAWES. The Senate having decided by a decisive majority that they will proceed with the regular order of business and not lay it aside for other business, I hope that no Senator will object to taking a vote now upon the resolution, so that we can proceed to the business of the executive session which I am so anxious to have transacted.

Mr. COCKRELL. Will the Senator tell us what resolution he is so anxious to get a vote on?

Mr. DAWES. The pending resolution, of course. Does the Senator not know that the pending resolution is the order?

Mr. COCKRELL. Has the committee of safety decided that it is to the interest of the country to act on the pending resolution?

Mr. DAWES. The Senate has decided by a decisive majority against every attempt on your side to prevent action on the pending resolution. I regret that the Senator from Missouri has not observed that significant fact.

Mr. COCKRELL. I want to know whether the ecumenical council of the republican caucus have considered this matter. If so, I hope they will announce their decision.

Mr. DAWES. If the Senator delays the business of the session to acquire that information, while it may be a sufficient justification to him, it will not be so deemed by the country. When the whole people of the Pacific coast are in arms calling upon the Senate to clear the way for action upon matters of vital interest, as they understand it, to their side, I do hope that the Senator from Missouri will in private consult those who understand what ecumenical councils are doing and let the business of the Senate go on.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am sure that if we can give that ecumenical council of seven an opportunity of having further counsel they will not insist upon such a thing as they have been insisting upon for a month or two—an impossibility. In order that this ecumenical council, this committee of seven, the committee of safety, may have an opportunity of meeting together and conferring with the brethren, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. DAWES. I do hope that the Senate will not adjourn in the present condition of business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] moves that the Senate now adjourn. [Putting the question.] The Chair cannot decide as to the result.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BURNSIDE, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Alabama, [Mr. MORGAN.] My colleague [Mr. ANTHONY] is paired with the Senator from Florida, [Mr. JONES.]

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. SAUNDERS. On the questions that are now before the Senate I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. WILLIAMS.] As he is not here I will announce the pair now and will probably not announce again to-day the fact that I am paired with him on all these questions.

The result was announced—yeas 21, nays 23; as follows:

YEAS—21.

Bayard,	Farley,	Jonas,	Vest,
Brown,	Gorman,	McPherson,	Voorhees,
Call,	Hampton,	Pugh,	Walker.
Camden,	Harris,	Ransom,

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator from Massachusetts has consumed so much time in explaining the importance of the pending resolution and justifying or attempting to justify the pertinacity with which he has pressed it, that I am inclined to think we ought to meet earlier than we have been in the habit of meeting. I therefore move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet at ten o'clock to-morrow morning.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask a question of the Senator from Tennessee, if he will permit me.

Mr. HARRIS. With great pleasure.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to ask the Senator if in case the Senate will accept his proposition he will agree to devote the two hours before twelve to disposing of the pending resolution for the election of officers, and then begin at twelve o'clock to-morrow with the executive session? If the Senator will make that agreement for his side, it will be a way in which we can remove all this trouble that we have had, because then nobody can claim that the public business is delayed. We propose to the Senator that we will take two hours extra to dispose of the matter first before the Senate, and then at twelve o'clock go into executive session, if he will agree to it.

Mr. HARRIS. Believing as I do that it is vastly more important that we should act upon the nomination of a supreme judge when the court has from day to day for several days at least had to adjourn because of the want of a quorum, and more important to act upon the various nominations of a number of officers whose offices have remained absolutely vacant for weeks and weeks and the public interest suffering by reason of it, I can never consent to give the precedence to a resolution that proposes to remove three or four officers of this body as to whose qualifications and efficiency no voice has ever been raised from any quarter, against whom there is not a single complaint. Believing it to be more important to dispose of these matters that I have suggested, which can only be disposed of in executive session, I notify the Senator from Massachusetts that immediately upon meeting at ten o'clock to-morrow, if the Senate shall so order, I shall move, if some other Senator does not, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. HOAR. I will propose to the Senator, then, that we meet at a quarter before ten and dispose of the resolutions for the choice of officers and be ready at ten to go with him into executive session. Will the Senator do that?

Mr. HARRIS. If the Senator from Massachusetts will consent to go with me into executive session and act upon that business for which this session of the Senate was convened, the business which all must admit is vastly more important than the disorganization of the Senate in order to reorganize it, I will agree to meet at seven or at any hour he will name, or to stay here all night to-night and proceed with the legitimate business of the session.

Mr. HOAR. Will you then consent to vote on the pending resolution?

Mr. HARRIS. When we have disposed of that business I will hear the Senator upon the question that he proposes, and will decide upon it then.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question before the Senate is the motion of the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. HARRIS,] that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet at ten o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. COCKRELL. I think that is a little too early, and I move to amend so that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet at ten o'clock and thirty minutes a. m. to-morrow.

Mr. DAWES. That is in the interest of dispatch, I suppose? That is to prevent anything dilatory, so that we can get at executive sessions?

Mr. HARRIS. I want the yeas and nays on both motions.

Mr. BROWN. I think that is still a little too early. I move to amend by making it eleven o'clock.

Mr. DAWES. I hope some Senator on that side to whom that duty is assigned will charge us now with dilatory motions so that we cannot proceed to executive business! I do not know which Senator that is.

Mr. HARRIS. I will withdraw my motion if the Senator from Massachusetts will move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. DAWES. If the Senator will withdraw it I will give him my word that I will make that motion which will bring us to an executive session in the quickest possible way.

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator move that the Senate do now proceed to the consideration of executive business?

Mr. DAWES. As I said a little while ago, the Senator insists upon having his way, not the way of the Senate. I give the Senator my word that the Senate itself, whose combined wisdom must be almost equal to that of the Senator from Tennessee, will go the shortest and most direct road to business if he will only withdraw his motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] moves that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at ten o'clock to-morrow, on which motion he asks for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] moves to amend the motion so that when the Senate adjourns to-day it will adjourn to meet to-morrow at ten o'clock and thirty minutes a. m., and on that the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] asks for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. BROWN] moves to amend the amendment so that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet to-morrow at eleven o'clock.

Mr. BROWN. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BROWN] is first in order, which is, that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet to-morrow at eleven o'clock.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Pending that motion I move that the Senate do now adjourn, and on that I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. DAWES. Notwithstanding the pending motion?

Mr. HARRIS. I believe that motion is not a debatable motion.

Mr. DAWES. I would not say anything, then.

Mr. HARRIS. I would not either, if I were the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from West Virginia, [Mr. DAVIS,] that the Senate adjourn, on which the yeas and nays have been demanded.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BURNSIDE, (when his name was called.) I will announce once for all that I am paired with the Senator from Alabama, [Mr. MORGAN.] My colleague [Mr. ANTHONY] is paired with the Senator from Florida, [Mr. JONES.]

Mr. COCKRELL, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Maine, [Mr. FRYE,] who is necessarily compelled to be at home. If I were not paired I should vote "yea," and he would vote "nay" if he were here.

Mr. COKE, (when Mr. MAXEY'S name was called.) I will announce for the day that my colleague [Mr. MAXEY] is paired with the Senator from Colorado, [Mr. TELLER.]

Mr. VEST, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. PLUMB.]

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 20, nays 22; as follows:

YEAS—20.

Bayard,	Davis of W. Va.,	Hill of Georgia,	Ransom,
Brown,	Farley,	Johnston,	Saulsbury,
Call,	Gorman,	Jonas,	Vance,
Camden,	Hampton,	McPherson,	Voorhees,
Coke,	Harris,	Pugh,	Walker.

NAYS—22.

Allison,	Edgerton,	Logan,	Platt of N. Y.,
Blair,	Hawley,	McDill,	Rollins,
Cameron of Wis.,	Hill of Colorado,	McMillan,	Sawyer,
Conger,	Hoar,	Mahone,	Sewell.
Conkling,	Ingalls,	Miller,
Dawes,	Kellogg,	Morrill,

ABSENT—34.

Anthony,	Ferry,	Jones of Florida,	Saunders,
Beck,	Frye,	Jones of Nevada,	Sherman,
Burnside,	Garland,	Lamar,	Slater,
Butler,	George,	Maxey,	Teller,
Cameron of Pa.,	Groome,	Mitchell,	Van Wyck,
Cockrell,	Grover,	Morgan,	Vest,
Davis of Illinois,	Hale,	Pendleton,	Williams.
Edmunds,	Harrison,	Platt of Conn.,
Fair,	Jackson,	Plumb,

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. BROWN,] that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet to-morrow at eleven o'clock, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DAWES, (when his name was called.) I am paired for the moment with the junior Senator from Georgia, [Mr. BROWN.]

Mr. SAWYER, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CAMDEN] for the remainder of the day.

Mr. VEST, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. PLUMB.]

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. McMILLAN, (after having voted in the negative.) I am paired with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. JOHNSTON] and voted inadvertently. I withdraw my vote.

The result was announced—yeas 16, nays 18; as follows:

YEAS—16.

Bayard,	Gorman,	Jonas,	Saulsbury,
Coke,	Hampton,	McPherson,	Vance,
Davis of W. Va.,	Harris,	Pugh,	Voorhees,
Farley,	Hill of Georgia,	Ransom,	Walker.

NAYS—18.

Allison,	Edgerton,	Kellogg,	Platt of N. Y.,
Blair,	Hawley,	McDill,	Rollins,
Cameron of Wis.,	Hill of Colorado,	Mahone,	Sewell.
Conger,	Hoar,	Miller,
Conkling,	Ingalls,	Morrill,

ABSENT—42.

Anthony,	Camden,	Fair,	Grover,
Beck,	Cameron of Pa.,	Ferry,	Hale,
Brown,	Cockrell,	Frye,	Harrison,
Burnside,	Davis of Illinois,	Garland,	Jackson,
Butler,	Dawes,	George,	Johnston,
Call,	Edmunds,	Groome,	Jones of Florida,

Jones of Nevada,	Mitchell,	Saunders,	Van Wyck,
Lamar,	Morgan,	Sawyer,	Vest,
Logan,	Pendleton,	Sherman,	Williams.
McMillan,	Platt of Conn.,	Slater,
Maxey,	Plumb,	Teller,

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No quorum has voted. The next business in order will be to call the roll of the Senate to ascertain if there is a quorum present. The Secretary will proceed to call the roll, and Senators will answer to their names, signifying their presence.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Allison,	Dawes,	Johnston,	Pugh,
Bayard,	Edgerton,	Jonas,	Ransom,
Beck,	Farley,	Jones of Nevada,	Rollins,
Blair,	Ferry,	Kellogg,	Saulsbury,
Brown,	Gorman,	Logan,	Saunders,
Burnside,	Hampton,	McDill,	Sawyer,
Call,	Harris,	McMillan,	Sewell,
Cameron of Wis.,	Hawley,	McPherson,	Sherman,
Cockrell,	Hill of Colorado,	Mahone,	Vance,
Coke,	Hill of Georgia,	Miller,	Vest,
Conger,	Hoar,	Morrill,	Voorhees,
Conkling,	Ingalls,	Platt of N. Y.,	Walker.
Davis of W. Va.,	Jackson,	Plumb,

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-one Senators having answered to their names there is a quorum present. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. BROWN,] that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at eleven o'clock to-morrow, no quorum having voted when the question was put before. The Secretary will again call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BECK, (when his name was called.) I answered "present" on the roll-call, but I am paired on all questions with the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HALE.]

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, (when his name was called.) I am paired for the day with the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. GROOME.]

Mr. COCKRELL, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Maine, [Mr. FRYE,] as I have been and will be for probably some days to come, until his return. If I could vote I should vote "yea," and if the Senator from Maine were present, he would vote "nay."

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 20, nays 20; as follows:

YEAS—20.

Bayard,	Farley,	Johnston,	Saulsbury,
Brown,	Gorman,	Jonas,	Vance,
Call,	Hampton,	McPherson,	Vest,
Coke,	Harris,	Pugh,	Voorhees,
Davis of W. Va.,	Hill of Georgia,	Ransom,	Walker.

NAYS—20.

Allison,	Edgerton,	Kellogg,	Morrill,
Blair,	Hawley,	McDill,	Platt of N. Y.,
Conger,	Hill of Colorado,	McMillan,	Plumb,
Conkling,	Hoar,	Mahone,	Rollins,
Dawes,	Ingalls,	Miller,	Sewell.

ABSENT—36.

Anthony,	Edmunds,	Harrison,	Pendleton,
Beck,	Fair,	Jackson,	Platt of Conn.,
Burnside,	Ferry,	Jones of Florida,	Saunders,
Butler,	Frye,	Jones of Nevada,	Sawyer,
Camden,	Garland,	Lamar,	Sherman,
Cameron of Pa.,	George,	Logan,	Slater,
Cameron of Wis.,	Groome,	Maxey,	Teller,
Cockrell,	Grover,	Mitchell,	Van Wyck,
Davis of Illinois,	Hale,	Morgan,	Williams.

So the motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. COCKRELL,] that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at half-past ten o'clock to-morrow, on which motion the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DAWES. Is this vote on the original proposition?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No, the original motion of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] was that when the Senate adjourns it be to meet to-morrow at ten o'clock. The pending question is the amendment of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] to fix the time at 10.30 o'clock.

Mr. COCKRELL. I moved the amendment for the benefit of the Senator especially. I did not think he wanted to come here as early as ten.

Mr. DAWES. If the Senator did it for my special benefit I wish he would withdraw it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will proceed with the roll-call.

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 19, nays 21; as follows:

YEAS—19.

Bayard,	Farley,	Jonas,	Vance,
Brown,	Gorman,	McPherson,	Vest,
Call,	Hampton,	Pugh,	Voorhees,
Coke,	Hill of Georgia,	Ransom,	Walker.

Hawley,	McDill,	Plumb,

ABSENT—36.

Anthony,	Davis of Illinois,	Hale,	Morgan,

Cameron of Wis.,	George,	Lamar,	Teller,
Cockrell,	Groome,	Maxey,	Van Wyck,
Conkling,	Grover,	Mitchell,	Williams.

So the motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. HARRIS,] that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet to-morrow at ten o'clock, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question being taken by yeas and nays resulted—yeas 20, nays 20; as follows:

YEAS—20.

Bayard,	Farley,	Johnston,	Saulsbury,
Brown,	Gorman,	Jonas,	Vance,
Call,	Hampton,	McPherson,	Vest,

Cameron of Wis.,	Groome,	Mitchell,	Teller,
Cockrell,	Grover,	Morgan,	Van Wyck,
Davis of Illinois,	Hale,	Pendleton,	Williams.

So the motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] to indefinitely postpone the pending resolution.

Mr. DAWES. Pending that motion, which the Senator has adhered to notwithstanding the repeated decisions of the Senate against him and my appeal to him to withdraw it, feeling that there is very little hope that the Senator will listen to an appeal from the Senate itself, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I ask the Senator to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. DAWES. Certainly.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I should like to take the floor for to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from West Virginia is recognized for that purpose. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts, that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at three o'clock and fifteen minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

TUESDAY, May 3, 1881.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

OFFICERS OF THE SENATE.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business of yesterday, being the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] providing for the election of certain officers of the Senate, the pending question being on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] to postpone the resolution indefinitely, upon which motion the yeas and nays have been ordered. The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. DAVIS] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. DAWES. Has the Senator from West Virginia given up the floor?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield the floor?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I do, for that purpose.

Mr. DAWES. If the Senator from West Virginia yields the floor

he must understand that he does not yield it for that purpose, but he yields it entirely.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield the floor?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I have no wish to interfere with the business for which we were convened. That being the fact, I will yield the floor willingly, and take the risk of getting it again. It will make very little difference to me whether I talk or not. I thought the Senate had but little to do and therefore I would trouble it to hear me answer some questions which have been propounded by the opposite side of the Chamber in regard to the debt between the Virginias; but if we can go into executive session and transact the business for which we were convened here, I will willingly yield and take the risk of never making the remarks which I desire to make. The Senator from Massachusetts has been very courteous and kind, and I have no wish in any way to reflect upon him or any other Senator in what I have said or may wish to say.

Mr. DAWES. When I moved to adjourn last night the Senator asked me to give way in order that he might take the floor for a speech this morning, which I did, and that left him upon the floor this morning. Of course the Senator, without any violation of propriety, can alter his mind and not make a speech now; but if the Senator took the floor under a claim to make a speech in order to yield it to the Senator from Ohio, it was different from my understanding. If the Senator desires to make his speech this morning upon the assignment of the floor which he had last night nobody ought to object. If he does not desire to make it upon that assignment, but yields the floor to the Senator from Ohio, then the Senator from Ohio makes his motion, and what will come after that will not depend upon the Senator from West Virginia but upon who is recognized by the Chair.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. It has been usual for the Senator from Ohio to make a motion each morning to proceed to the consideration of executive business. There had been no consultation today between myself and the Senator from Ohio; not one word. The Senator from Ohio not being in his seat yesterday evening when the Senate adjourned, perhaps he was not aware of what occurred; but certainly he or some other Senator upon this side has regularly every morning made an effort to go into executive session, and I to-day am willing to yield for that purpose.

Mr. HOAR. I desire, simply speaking for one, to say to Senators on the other side that although undoubtedly it would give great pleasure to most of the Senate to hear the Senator from West Virginia, yet when a Senator gives notice (especially when that notice is given by an appeal to the courtesy of our side to withdraw a pending motion) that he proposes to occupy the first part of the time of the Senate when they assemble with a speech, some gentleman might possibly absent himself, having business at the Departments, or being ill, or coming late. I do not think that on reflection either the Senator from West Virginia or the Senator from Ohio, both of whom are incapable of any artifice, would think in the present equal division of the Senate that it was quite fair, after such a practical notice given the night before, to withdraw it for a test vote of this kind. I do not mean to impute any such thing to either Senator; but it is possible that the view which I suggest may not have occurred to them, and I am quite sure that when it does occur to them they will agree that justice to themselves requires that the first portion of the time this morning should be occupied by the speech of which the Senator from West Virginia gave notice yesterday.

Mr. PENDLETON. I was not in the Senate at the time of the adjournment yesterday, and was unaware at the time I made the motion to go into executive session this morning that the Senator from West Virginia was entitled to the floor. I have several times asked gentlemen to yield in order that I might make a motion of this kind; but upon the suggestion of the Senator from Massachusetts that possibly a motion at this time might take gentlemen unawares, as I did on a former occasion on a suggestion from him, I withdraw the motion or withdraw the application to make it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Ohio withdraws the motion, and the Senator from West Virginia has the floor.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Mr. President, I shall regret if I am the cause of preventing the Senate, even for the short time that I shall address it, from going into executive session, as was shown by my desire to forego any remarks that I proposed to make when this question first arose this morning; but it appears right and proper that I should proceed, at least for a short time, as it was expected by both sides of the Senate that I should do so.

Mr. President, it has been and is my impression that the debt question between the Virginias or the question of the debt of any State has no proper place here. It is a local question, and belongs to the States respectively and not to Congress. If apology be necessary for my remarks this morning it will be found in the statements of the junior Senator from Virginia, [Mr. MAHONE,] the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] and the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. HAWLEY.] Each of these Senators has referred to the debt question between the Virginias in an unfavorable and, as I think, an unfriendly way toward West Virginia, and especially has one of those Senators censured the democratic party of West Virginia for its course. I shall endeavor to present the question in a fair and impartial way, and hope to do so in an honorable and proper way, and in whatever I may say I shall have no intention whatever of reflecting upon Virginia or any of its people. On the contrary, I believe Virginia has done all she could under the circumstances to pay her debt, and will continue to do so unless prevented by unforeseen difficulties arising from political combinations or otherwise.

If while on the floor I shall misstate any fact I shall be obliged to any Senator if he will stop and correct me. It is my intention to present the question as I believe it exists, and I shall not take it as an improper interruption if there be a Senator who wishes to correct or have me correct any statement I may make.

My colleague [Mr. CAMDEN] a few days ago made a very clear and full statement in detail of the debt question between the Virginias as it appears upon the official records. I shall not attempt to repeat it in detail, but I shall refer to some of the principal facts which he cited and some perhaps which were omitted by him because not necessary for the purpose he had in hand at the time he spoke.

The debt question in West Virginia has not been made a political one so far as my knowledge goes. Neither of the political parties there has undertaken to make political capital out of it. On the contrary, it has, so far as I know, by all the political platforms made in that State been treated alike by democrats and republicans. Each party, it is true, has a record to which I may undertake to refer, and I shall give only the official acts without much comment.

I regret very much that republican Senators here should undertake to make statements reflecting unfavorably upon the State which I in part represent, and also upon the democratic party. My impression is that the Senators, or at least some of them, who made the statement that West Virginia had repudiated or that West Virginia had refused to answer any call upon her by the old State, had not examined the facts. They will find, as I believe, when they examine all the facts connected with the case, that they have been wrong; and I know some of those Senators at least, for whom I entertain high regard, would not misstate any fact, much less one relating to a State of this Union. I shall deal to some extent with figures and necessarily will have to refer to memoranda that I have made.

The junior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] stated in substance that the republican party of West Virginia had put in the constitution of 1863 a clause providing for the prompt payment of the debt between the States, had sent commissioners to Richmond, and that the democrats had done nothing toward settling the debt between Virginia and West Virginia. That in substance was the statement of the junior Senator from Connecticut, which I shall notice hereafter.

The Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] who I am gratified to say would not misstate a fact knowingly, a gentleman with whom my own relations have always been very friendly and kind, made a statement which I am about to read and which I know he could not have made if he had examined the question fully. The republican Senator from Ohio, the present junior Senator, though certainly senior in service here, said:

> Well, sir, the two States could not agree; they appointed commissioners at one time; but there was a difference as to the mode and manner of the division, whether it should be based upon population or upon property, and finally it fell through until the democratic party came into power in West Virginia, and then the debt was repudiated.

I corrected the Senator at the time, and I shall refer to it again before I close my remarks.

The junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. MAHONE] in two or three sentences in his recent speech referred to the debt question between the Virginias in a political sense, as if it belonged to political parties. The Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] not now in his seat, more than once has referred to the debt question in an unfavorable light toward West Virginia.

It is true that from various causes little or nothing was done between the States that amounted to anything looking to the adjustment of the debt question until 1870 or 1871. The dates are important, for it will be recollected by all that the State of West Virginia was in republican control, both the governor and Legislature, from its beginning up to the fall of 1870, when in the election of 1870 a democratic governor and a democratic Legislature were chosen.

In February, 1866, Virginia passed a joint resolution appointing commissioners to treat with West Virginia for the reunion of the States and also to consider the debt question. West Virginia responded to that resolution in the following year declining to treat for reunion, but providing for the appointment of commissioners to treat for an adjustment of the debt question. From some cause or other the commissioners of neither of the States visited the capital of the other, and nothing was done.

In December, 1866, Virginia brought an action in the Supreme Court of the United States against West Virginia for the recovery of the counties of Berkeley and Jefferson, which question incidentally brought up the existence of the new State itself. That suit was decided in March, 1871, in favor of West Virginia.

In 1870 Virginia and West Virginia appointed commissioners, but from some cause or other they were prevented from doing anything.

The West Virginia senate journal of March 1870, page 206, shows that Mr. DAVIS, your speaker, introduced a resolution looking to the settlement of the debt between the Virginias, and that resolution after some debate was passed, and by it the governor was authorized to appoint commissioners. Again, early in 1871, a resolution was passed by the Legislature of West Virginia, as the journal of 1870 will show, on pages 90, 197, 206, 216, and 251. That resolution also was introduced by your speaker, and finally passed. The first resolution was passed by a republican Legislature. The last one named was passed by a democratic Legislature, and the commissioners were appointed by a democratic governor, and the commissioners appointed under that resolution were the first to take action. That was in February, 1871.

Under their appointment the commissioners proceeded to Richmond to endeavor to make a settlement between the two States. They found no one there, as they state in their report, to treat with them. No one in any manner received them officially. They were received, of course, as gentlemen, but not officially, and therefore they had to proceed, as it were, ex parte. No one was ready on the part of Virginia to treat with them.

This was as late as 1871, and the report of these commissioners of West Virginia is the last official act of either State on the subject; so that West Virginia did send its commissioners to Richmond for the purpose of treating on the debt question in September, 1871, I think, and since that time nothing has been done officially by either State to my knowledge.

Mr. SHERMAN. What was the date of the appointment of the commissioners?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The commissioners were appointed, as I have stated, in February, 1871, upon the motion of myself.

Mr. SHERMAN. That was before the adoption of the new constitution?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Yes, the new constitution, of which I will speak directly to my friend, was adopted in the winter of 1872–'73. It was before the adoption of the new constitution, and I will restate that so far as my knowledge of the record goes that act of West Virginia was the last by which either of the States invited the other to a settlement of the debt question. I have stated that there has not been in West Virginia a political cast given to that debt question between the two States.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. With pleasure.

Mr. KELLOGG. As the Senator passes along, I suggest that he state also whether or not the Legislature of the State of Virginia had in 1870 and several subsequent years consecutively made repeated efforts by invitation to the authorities of the State of West Virginia that they should take some steps looking to a co-operation with Virginia to adjust the vexed question of the relative proportion of the debt that each State should bear, and without success, until in 1870 the governor of Virginia addressing the Legislature in his annual message commented on that fact and deprecated the fact that the authorities of West Virginia would not recognize any invitation of that kind?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I am pleased that the Senator has called my attention to the special matter of which he now speaks; I shall probably refer to it before I finish my remarks; but I must now answer the Senator as I understand the facts to be.

Between 1866 and 1871 there were several appointments of commissioners by each of the States. One State sometimes appointed commissioners and the other State appointed arbitrators; one provided for the payment of the necessary expenses of the commissioners and the other did not. There were negotiations going on between the States from 1866 to 1870, but there was no good result; nothing came out of the negotiations. Each State, at all times, as I understand it, had a commission appointed, but from some cause or other neither of the commissioners met the other. It has been asserted and believed by many that it was because of Federal interference with the State of Virginia. From 1866 to 1870 the State of Virginia was in military control, and therefore she said all that time she was not in a condition to treat with West Virginia.

Mr. KELLOGG. Not in December, 1870?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I said up to 1870. I will say to the Senator from Louisiana, as I have already stated, that in 1866 Virginia brought an action in the Supreme Court of the United States against West Virginia for the recovery of the counties of Berkeley and Jefferson, and that that suit was as well looking to the question of the existence of the new State as it was to the relation of those particular counties; and while that suit was in existence it was almost impossible for either the old State or the new State to have treated properly, because none could tell what disposition would be made of those two counties.

I have stated two or three times, and I wish to impress it upon the Senate, that so far as I know the question is not a political one in our State; there is no division there, yet during the whole time, from the organization of the State in 1863 up to and including 1870, the State was in republican hands; the Legislature, the governor, and the State officers were republican. If there had been a disposition on the part of the republicans to settle and adjust the debt something might have been done during that entire time. But I would not have referred to the subject in a political sense except for the fact that it has been referred to in a political way two or three times on the opposite side of the Chamber.

My friend the Senator from Ohio a moment ago asked me as regards the constitution of 1872–'73 as we know it, whether the commissioners to whom I referred were appointed before or after that constitution was adopted. It will be recollected by the Senators from Virginia that in March, 1871, Virginia passed what is known as the funding bill. After that time our commissioners went to Richmond for the purpose of trying to adjust the debt, but the funding bill, as I understand it, set aside arbitrarily, as the junior Senator from Virginia said, two-thirds of the debt to the old State and one-third to the new State. While that bill did not refer directly to the repeal of the former negotiations, I think the governor of Virginia said that he considered it had that effect, and he had no right to name commissioners to negotiate with West Virginia. I think it will be found that since the passage of the funding bill in March, 1871, the governors of Virginia uniformly have said that they had no power to answer the call of West Virginia for a settlement of the debt question. I wish to state again, so that it will not be overlooked, that so far as I know and believe the last official act and the last commissioners that were appointed and the last ones who acted were on the part of West Virginia inviting Virginia to meet her.

The constitution of 1863 it is true did provide for a recognition of the debt between the two States, and the provision stood from 1863, when the constitution was adopted, up to 1872. Of course the clause was voted for by the republicans, or the Union men as they were then called, in the State, and I did not differ very widely from them. As I have stated, absolutely nothing was done until the winter of 1871, when the resolutions I have referred to were passed.

It was stated by one or two Senators, and the question of the Senator from Ohio leads to that, that the constitution of 1863 did recognize the debt between the two States, while that of 1872 did not. In that I think Senators are mistaken. It is true that a part of the democrats of the convention that framed the constitution of 1872 voted to retain the old clause. I believe from my present information if I had been in that convention I should have voted with other democrats to retain that clause. I saw no use in striking it out, and especially as they inserted a clause fully as effective and perhaps more effective in the constitution of 1872. I call the attention of the Senator from Ohio to the fact that in the constitution of 1872–'73, as we term it, in article 10, on "taxation and finance," the fourth section provides that—

> No debt shall be contracted by this State, except to meet casual deficits in the revenue, to redeem a previous liability of the State, to suppress insurrection, &c.

There was no "previous liability of the State" existing except that arising from the relation between the two States; none other was thought of; the State owed no debt; and when it made provision to relieve a "previous liability," of course it referred to the debt question between the two States. It could have referred to no other "liability," because no other existed. Again, the next section provides that—

> The power of taxation of the Legislature shall extend to provisions for the payment of the State debt, &c.

What "State debt?" Of course no other could have existed; there never has been any other, except that arising from the relations existing between the two States as to the old debt of Virginia. It also provides that the Legislature may make provisions for the "interest thereon, the support of free schools," &c. It is unnecessary for me to read the whole section. I think if the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. HAWLEY,] whom I do not see in his seat, had examined the clause that I have referred to, he would not have stated that in the constitution of 1872 no provision was made for a previous liability of the State. I think the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] whom I now see across the way, made a similar statement. One of the Senators asked me personally whether I could show him a clause in the constitution of 1872–'73 that recognized the existence in any way of a debt between the States.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not wish to interfere in West Virginia matters; but I am advised by a gentleman, indeed I am advised by the Senator's predecessor, that this question was debated in the convention of 1872; that he offered an amendment to the constitution recognizing the liability of West Virginia for a portion of the debt of the State of Virginia; and that it was voted down chiefly by a party vote, the democrats nearly all voting against the amendment and the republicans all but one voting for it. I thought I would mention the fact so as to give the Senator an opportunity to controvert it, if he chooses.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I think the Senator from Ohio has stated substantially the fact, and I do not disagree with him upon it. When the former provision of the constitution was offered by Mr. Willey in 1872, it was voted down, as the Senator has stated, but not entirely by democrats nor was it sustained entirely by republicans. It was a divided vote, but the democrats as a rule voted against the provision. However, instead of that provision I call the attention of the Senator from Ohio to the fact that they put in one that was equally and perhaps more effective, for it says the State shall not contract a debt except "to redeem a previous liability of the State," and no other "previous liability" existed except that arising between the two States. Mr. Willey, who was my predecessor, was a member of the constitutional convention, and did make an effort to retain the old clause, and it was voted for by democrats and voted against by republicans, but principally, as I have stated, the democrats voted against it.

It may not be uninteresting to Senators to see the certificate given by Virginia for the one-third of the debt set aside arbitrarily, as the junior Senator from Virginia says, to West Virginia. I hold one of the certificates in my hand, and I ask that it be inserted in the RECORD if possible in the precise shape and manner in which it is:

Commonwealth of Virginia,

[Seal of State of Virginia.]

Treasurer's Office, Richmond, Virginia, July 1, 1871.

This is to certify that there is due unto ..... heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns, ..... Dollars, being ONE-THIRD of bond surrendered under the provisions of An Act approved March 30, 1871, entitled, "An act to provide for the funding and payment of the public debt, (viz, Bond No. ..... with interest amounting to ..... dollars.) Payment of said ONE-THIRD with interest thereon, at the rate of Six per Cent. per Annum, will be provided for in accordance with such settlement as shall hereafter be had, between the States of Virginia and West Virginia, in regard to the public debt of the State of Virginia, existing at the time of its dismemberment, and the State of Virginia holds said bonds so far as unfunded in trust for the holder thereof or his assigns.

In Testimony whereof, this Certificate has been signed by the Treasurer and countersigned by the Second Auditor as provided by law.

SEAL

..... [Cut.] .....

Second Auditor. Treas. Commonwealth of Virginia.

It will be noticed that this certificate calls for a recognition when a settlement takes place between the two States, and not until then.

The West Virginia debt commissioners, after their visit to Richmond in the fall of 1871, reported to the governor and Legislature of West Virginia:

That they found the debt of Virginia, January 1, 1861, to be	$31,778,867 32
That there had been expended for public improvements in the old State about	30,000,000 00
For public improvements in West Virginia about	2,500,000 00

They further reported that nearly all the public buildings for which in part the debt had been created, as well as the improvements, were in the old State. The commissioners also reported, and I believe correctly, that of the territory the counties which Virginia retained comprised 41,352 square miles, and those of West Virginia about 20,000 square miles, or less than one-third of the whole territory. By the census of 1860 the counties Virginia retained contained a population of 1,220,829; the counties of West Virginia 374,000, or less than one-fourth of the population. The net or proper revenue of Virginia in 1860 was $3,936,873.50; of the counties in West Virginia $647,076.90, leaving in Virginia net revenue of $2,289,793.60, so that less than one-sixth of the revenue of the two States at the time of their separation went to West Virginia and five-sixths of the revenue, as well as the great bulk of the improvements, went to the old State.

Let me in this connection present some of the statements prepared by these commissioners which led to the conclusions I have just stated:

STATEMENT A, showing the amount of the public debt of Virginia on the 1st day of January, 1861, and the amounts thereof held by that State; also the amount thereof incurred for public improvements in West Virginia.

The debt of Virginia on the 1st of January, 1861, as per the auditor's report to the extra session of the Legislature on the 10th of December preceding, was as follows:

Debt of January 1, 1852	$10,508,845 30
Debt created since that time	23,379,946 33
Total	33,888,791 63

Amount brought forward		$33,888,791 63

* The statement shows a total expenditure in West Virginia of $3,345,929.29, but only the above amount for public improvements.

Amount brought forward		$33,131,090 00
To this amount add, as per Governor Walker's message of March 8, 1870, for amounts "lost, abandoned, or surrendered and released," the following sums, viz:

Total*		9,739,092 88
Grand total		42,870,182 88

In the conclusion of their report the commissioners state the account between the two States, showing West Virginia to owe less than a million dollars, thus:

Upon the data thus ascertained and explained, we summarize the account between the two States, as follows:

West Virginia to the State of Virginia, debtor.

For the amounts expended and invested in her territory, as set forth in Statement F	$3,343,929 29

Creditor.

By one-fourth of the estimated value of the public buildings and other assets, as given in Statement G	$968,750 00
By three-thirteenths of the United States surplus fund, as per same statement	446,032 92
By three-sevenths of the literary fund, as per same	647,079 92
By the amount collected in West Virginia after January 1, 1861, as per Statement E	328,706 22
		2,390,569 06
Balance due Virginia		953,360 23

It will be noticed that nearly all the improvements, nine-tenths of the improvements for which the debt was created, were made within the old State, and that the old State to-day has the benefit of them and has always had.

The Virginia debt in 1861, in round numbers, was	$31,000,000
In 1871	45,000,000
In 1881	30,000,000

The latter sum, of course, is after setting aside the amount said to be due by West Virginia. Now, as I understand, if she follows the advice of the junior Senator from Virginia, and readjusts or eliminates, the amount will be $20,000,000 instead of $30,000,000, as is now reported in round numbers by the old State. Of course in a settlement of the debt question between the States these different amounts would have to be taken into consideration, and of course it is a debatable question which one of the three or four amounts I have named should be taken.

The Virginia funding act of 1871 in its recitals states that the bondholder may prefer to look to West Virginia rather than to the old State for the one-third arbitrarily assigned to West Virginia. This of itself raises the question whether or not the State of West Virginia or the State of Virginia is bound for the new certificate which has been set aside for the one-third thus arbitrarily assigned. The State of Virginia in its funding act set aside one-third or about fifteen million dollars for the State of West Virginia to settle. West Virginia believes, all her people and all the people of the old State believe, that West Virginia owes very much less than one-third or $15,000,000 of that debt. In no statement of Virginia's debt since 1870 has the $15,000,000 set aside by the State of Virginia arbitrarily, as the junior Senator says, to West Virginia appeared; and therefore, when you speak of the Virginia debt, it is exclusive of the $15,000,000 or one-third set aside for West Virginia. It is very plain that West Virginia is not properly liable for any such sum. I have shown by figures, and I think they cannot be disputed, that West Virginia received from the old State less than one-third of the territory, less than one-fourth of the population, less than one-sixth of the taxable property, and that fully nine-tenths of the improvements for which the debt was created were made in the old State and not in the new. If West Virginia received less than one-third of the territory, less than one-fourth of the population, less than one-sixth of the taxable property, and only about one-tenth of the improvements for which the debt was created, can it be justly said that that State in any way owes one-third of this debt? I think nobody who will examine the figures will contend for that.

* We add these amounts simply because we find them given by the governor as addenda to the $33,131,090, and not because we find them in any official record to which we have had access.

Again, Mr. President, can you tax a mountain uninhabited at the same rate you would tax a valley well improved? For instance, the State of West Virginia we all know was the mountainous part of the original Commonwealth, thinly inhabited. The old State was more fortunate, more thickly inhabited, and the money borrowed, for which the debt was created, was expended, as a rule, almost entirely in the old State, at least nine-tenths of it. The old State has possession of or has sold the entire improvements, and the new State never asked or received any benefit whatever from them.

I have stated that both States have made several efforts to secure a settlement or adjustment of the debt question, but thus far they have failed. I have also stated that in 1866 Virginia did bring suit in the United States courts against West Virginia for the counties of Berkeley and Jefferson. If there was an anxiety, as was stated by the junior Senator from Virginia, to settle this debt question between the two States, why is it, how is it that no action has been brought against the State of West Virginia for a settlement? The courts are open and have been open for the last ten years, and no such effort has been made.

Mr. President, in my opinion no individual, no firm, no corporation, no city, town, State, or government can afford to ignore a just and honorable debt. A State cannot do so even with as much propriety as an individual. The law can compel payment by the one; in the case of the other it is a debt more of honor; and I believe it is the duty of every citizen of a State to do his full share to have his State, no matter whether it owes much or little, do its part, its honest part, its just part, its equitable part toward the settlement and payment of any debt it may owe, and so far as my voice goes it will always be in that direction. I cannot account for you, my republican friends, who to-day are giving encouragement to a faction that I believe, and many others believe, means to eliminate at least, if not to repudiate, a part of the debt of Virginia. The junior Senator from Virginia said in his remarks here that he was for eliminating one-third of that debt; yet we find the votes cast here all go in the same direction. No matter what republican Senators may think on other subjects, I do not see how they can indorse that part of the platform of the Senator from Virginia.

As I understand the McCulloch bill, as it is called and known in Virginia, it proposes in substance to take the whole debt, make an average interest of 4 per cent., make the bonds non-taxable, make the coupons receivable for taxes and all other debts due the State. The Riddleberger bill, as I understand it, eliminates one-third of the whole debt or reduces it from $30,000,000 to $20,000,000, taxes the bonds, says the coupons shall not be receivable for taxes or other dues to the State and proposes 3 per cent. interest. The McCulloch bill says "with the consent of the creditors we will do this;" the Riddleberger bill, as I understand it, says "we will do it whether the creditors consent to it or not." I understand that to be the condition of the two bills.

Mr. President, when we come to think of it the debt of the two Virginias, so very large apparently, is not so considerable as one would imagine at first sight. It is less than $20 per capita, while the United States debt to-day per capita is about double that. England and France and many of the nations of Europe owe five times the amount per capita that the State of Virginia does to-day or the Virginias, if you choose to put it in that way. I have a table that I think will throw some light on that question. This table shows that the rate of tax in Virginia is fifty cents on the $100. Now take half a dozen or more of the leading northern cities and you find in New York the taxation is $2.58, Brooklyn $2.71, Philadelphia $2.30, Boston $2.35, Chicago $4.23, and so on, and all this against fifty cents in Virginia.

When you take the debt per capita your city, Mr. President, has a debt per capita, according to Spofford's Almanac, which is standard authority, now of $118 per capita; Brooklyn $75 per capita; Boston $115, and so on, while Virginia has about $20, showing that the debt of the Virginias, as hard as it may be for them to pay, is not so great but that it can be paid.

Let me present this table in detail, for it is very instructive:

Statement showing the population, debt, and rate of taxation in several of the cities of the United States and the State of Virginia for the years 1879 and 1880.

I have another table, taking the population of several of the States, among them the States of Massachusetts and Tennessee, and several foreign countries, and showing what the debt is per capita in each:

I also present a table showing the population, amount of taxable property, assessed value, and rate of State tax in several of the States, including Virginia, and the rate of taxation:

Statement showing the population, amount of taxable property assessed, and the rate of State tax on the same, of the several States.

Oregon	174,767	46,422,817	70
Nevada	62,265	29,564,673	90

This shows that the State tax in Virginia is less than in many of the other States.

Mr. HOAR. Does the Senator speak of taxation for all purposes, or merely the State tax?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The State tax. Take your State tax for all purposes and it will be much higher than any sum I have named. The State of Massachusetts I had not in my list, but I think the State tax is very low in that State; but for general purposes the tax in Massachusetts perhaps will be equal to almost any other State. I know the State of Massachusetts raises a large school-fund. I had occasion to examine that not long since.

Mr. President, during the late war, as Senators on both sides of the Chamber know, the States of Virginia and West Virginia were the breakwater between the contending armies; some portions of each of those States were raided over probably a hundred times, and in many parts of them not a house nor a barn nor a stable nor anything else was left. In some portions I doubt whether you would find a horse, cow, or chicken after the war. Is it strange that either of the Virginias should have been in a distressed financial condition after the war? They had lost almost everything they had. It necessarily took some time to change that state of things and get back to a healthy condition. The Northern and the Western States instead of becoming poor, instead of losing their property, had generally increased in wealth during the war. These States were poor; everything they had, their houses, their cows, their horses, and nearly everything the people had, was gone. Therefore there is considerable, and there ought to be considerable apology for the Southern States, particularly the Virginias, if they did not do all that persons would like them to have done toward paying their debts.

While that was the state of affairs in both the Virginias, it must be borne in mind that even the United States with its vast resources from 1873 up to 1879 increased its interest-bearing debt. I have here a statement made up only a short time ago by the Treasury Department, perhaps by my distinguished friend from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] which shows that the interest-bearing debt actually increased from 1873 up to the present date. The interest-bearing debt of the United States was less in 1873 than it is to-day, and less by eighty-odd millions than it was in 1879. The Senator from Ohio shakes his head, but the statement is here.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator is mistaken in the statement that between the present time and 1873 the interest-bearing debt has increased. That is a mistake, as will be seen by a comparison of the tables; but let me say that the interest-bearing debt was increased by the process of resumption by the sale of ninety million bonds which had no connection whatever with the condition of the Treasury. The public debt less the cash on hand has diminished since the time he stated over $200,000,000.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. If I had not the table in my hand I would not question the Senator's statement; but I will send it to him, and he will see for himself that he is mistaken as to the amount. The debt less the cash in the Treasury has decreased about one hundred million according to this table, a little over one hundred million; but I send this statement to the Senator, and he can look at it himself. He will find there, also, that the outstanding interest-bearing debt has actually increased between these periods. If that be so, can it be strange that Virginia was not able to pay her indebtedness?

Mr. SHERMAN. I call the attention of my friend to the fact that he has a statement here nearly a year old.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Eighteen hundred and eighty.

Mr. SHERMAN. July 1, 1880. I was speaking of the present time; since the date of this paper the public debt has been diminished $80,000,000.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Then I will correct myself if I said 1881 instead of 1880. I meant to speak of 1880, and I understood the Senator to refer to the same date. Of course in the last year the debt has materially decreased, and the Senator is right if he says two hundred millions is the difference between the debt, less cash in the Treasury, now and in 1873. The figures which I have taken from the official tables, and on which I rely, are these:

Total interest-bearing debt of United States:
1879	$1,797,643,700 00
1873	1,710,483,950 00
Increase	87,159,750 00
1880	1,723,993,100 00
Outstanding principal:
1878	2,256,205,892 53
1872	2,253,251,328 78
Increase	2,954,563 75
Total debt less cash in Treasury:
1873	2,105,462,060 75
1879	1,996,414,905 03
Decrease	109,047,155 72

Mr. SHERMAN. I will state another thing in regard to the $90,000,000 bonds sold. Every dollar of those bonds is represented by gold in the Treasury which is the basis of resumption, so that the aggregate debt was not increased. We had $90,000,000 of gold in the Treasury, and we had $90,000,000 of bonds outstanding, and that gold was part of the resumption fund; but when you deduct the amount of cash on hand from the amount of bonds outstanding, the debt has been constantly diminishing as this statement will show.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The Senator will hardly say "constantly," because he will find between 1871 and 1875, probably—I speak from recollection now—the debt did not decrease constantly.

Mr. SHERMAN. There was one year when, I think, there was a deficiency of four or five millions.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. When the Senator changes his date from 1880 to 1881, I agree with him that the debt, less the cash on hand, has decreased about two hundred million dollars since 1873; but if he confines himself to the time I stated, the decrease is only about one hundred million dollars. That, however, does not change the fact that the interest-bearing debt of the United States increased nearly one hundred million dollars between the years 1873 and 1879, nor that the principal outstanding was increased between those years.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am sure my friend, on a matter respecting the public debt, does not wish to lead any one into error. The statement that he sends me shows that every year since 1866 the debt, less the cash on hand, has diminished. In no single year has it increased. The statement that he sends me shows that, for instance, in 1873 it was $2,105,462,060, and the next year it was $2,104,149,153, the decrease being only a little over a million; but in other years it ranged from sixty to eighty millions, so that there was no year in which the debt did not decrease. The interest-bearing debt or bonds of the United States did increase during the time when bonds were sold for resumption purposes, but now the amount of interest-bearing bonds is largely less than it was at any time previous.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I think the Senator is correct in that statement. The difference between the Senator and myself was in the date. I said 1880 and he understood me to refer to 1881. Still, Mr. President, this does not change the fact which I stated, that the interest-bearing debt of the United States increased between 1873 and 1879 eighty-odd million dollars; it is true it was for resumption purposes; but it is the fact nevertheless. Then the outstanding debt increased somewhat, but not much.

I will state just here a fact which the Senator from Ohio well knows, that the law requires a sinking fund perhaps up to $40,000,000 per annum. That was not paid, the law was not complied with during many years; and it was because there were hard times, as we term them. There had not come the change in the finances, and the revenue did not yield a sufficient amount to pay the sinking fund during several years.

There is an impression in the country and perhaps here that Virginia has paid very little or none of her interest. That is a great mistake. I have shown that the interest-bearing debt of the United States Government had increased during that time. Now I have a statement commencing in 1872–73 which shows that Virginia each year of the time named has paid an average of nearly 4½ per cent. on her entire debt. I repeat it, Virginia, with all her distress and with her enormous debt, if it may be so termed, paid, commencing with 1872-'73, up to last year, an average upon her entire debt, estimated at $30,000,000, of 4.39 per cent. interest. So that a person owning a Virginia bond which cost him fifty cents in the market would have gotten, if he received his full interest, double 6 per cent., and every creditor has received, except on some bonds which are scattering and have not been funded, 4.39 per cent., which is more interest than a Government bond can bring to-day and more interest than a Government bond has brought for some time back and more than it is necessary for the Government to pay. So taking what are known as the 10-40 bonds of Virginia, to-day selling in the market for fifty cents, the holder of that bond gets the whole amount of his interest, which is 3 per cent. on the face value, being all that his bond calls for, and at the rate it is selling it would be equal to 6 per cent. Take again what are known in Virginia as the consols, and of which there are $14,000,000 which bring 6 per cent. interest, and the holders of this $14,000,000 of bonds from 1872-'73 to the present day have got every cent of their interest. Virginia does not owe one dollar of interest on those $14,000,000 of bonds, and the bonds are selling for eighty cents in the market to-day. A person owning what is known as a 10-40 consol of Virginia gets nearly double the interest that he would from a Government bond to-day when you take the price of the two bonds into consideration.

How is it with the peelers? The peelers, I understand, are that part of the debt not yet funded. They are selling to-day at about thirty-eight cents in the dollar. If the holder of that bond got his full interest he would get nearly 12 per cent. on the market value. So you will see that though Virginia bonds are depreciated in the market and Government bonds are high in proportion because all the people are sustaining the credit of the Government at 3½, and glad to get 3½ per cent. interest, and you could probably borrow at 3, there is a party in Virginia who brings in question the justice of the Virginia debt, which throws discredit upon it of course, and that bond, though paying more interest than a Government bond, is selling perhaps at an average of fifty cents on the dollar. Let me present in detail the table to which I have just referred:

Statement of the estimated debt, the annual interest, and rate of interest paid by the State of Virginia from 1872 to 1880; also rate of interest paid on United States and Virginia bonds.

Date.	Estimated debt.	Interest paid.	Rate of interest.

Average		1, 317, 296 72	4. 39

Virginia 10-40's, $50, 3 per cent.=6 per cent.
Virginia consols, $80, 6 per cent.=7½ per cent.
Virginia peelers, $38, 4.39 per cent.=11.55 per cent.
United States 4's, 1907, $115½, 4 per cent.=3.47 per cent.
United States 4½'s, 1891, $113, 4½ per cent.=3.98 per cent.
United States currency 6's, $132, 6 per cent.=4.54 per cent.

I believe, Mr. President, that if the whole people of Virginia were united and would say as the Government of the United States has said, and as the Senator from Ohio would say and make others say, "We can pay and will pay every dollar that the government of the State owes," Virginia's debt to-day would stand in the market not so good as a United States Government bond, but it certainly would be very much better than it is, and I believe that the cause of the depression there is that a party is trying for political or other purposes to depreciate the debt, trying to eliminate it, as it is said, instead of going to work squarely and fairly and saying, "We can and will pay all that we justly and rightly owe." A million of dollars is not so much of a debt now as it used to be. I see my friend from New York, [Mr. CONKLING.] There are single individuals in his great city who are said to be worth more money twice over than the whole debt of Virginia. There are telegraph companies in this land whose stock capital and debt are three times as great as the entire amount of the Virginia debt. There are a dozen railroad companies whose debt and stock combined are two or three times as much as the entire amount the State of Virginia owes.

Mr. CONKLING. What is the entire debt of Virginia?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. As reported, $30,000,000 in round numbers, as the debt-payers say, while the readjusters and some others propose to make it about twenty million dollars, as I understand.

Virginia in my opinion can pay a dollar to-day with more ease than she could pay twenty-five cents a few years ago. We hear of at least half a dozen railroads being built in each of the Virginias; we hear of northern capital and capital from abroad going to Virginia for the iron, coal, and other things there; the enterprise of the State is becoming profitable and will be more profitable. Virginia has $107,482,546, according to Spofford's Almanac, a standard authority, invested in railroads, nearly four times as much as her entire debt as recognized. Those railroads earned last year $7,280,830; their working expenses were $4,946,817, leaving $2,234,013 net profit. A large part of these railroads was built out of the money which created the debt that is now in question between the two States, and I commend to my friend, the senior Senator from Virginia, [Mr. JOHNSTON,] when he talks about the debt to reflect that he has to-day railroads in his State nearly two thousand miles in extent, the larger portion of which was built from the money for the receipt of which the debt was created. I do not complain of Virginia in any way. I believe she has done and will do her full duty, and I have great sympathy for her and her whole people. I would not injure her in any manner.

Mr. President, it must be recollected that a United States 6 per cent. bond did not reach par in gold until 1872 or 1873. We know that Government bonds during the war were sold as low as between forty and fifty cents in the foreign markets.

The Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] who I am glad to see has returned to his seat, said in substance the other day that Virginia had been doing nothing to pay her debt. I have just stated, and that Senator will see it in print, that she has been doing a great deal. Virginia has paid more than 4½ per cent. on her entire debt from 1872 down to the present day, and for a class of her bonds, amounting to nearly $23,000,000, she has paid every dollar of the interest and does not owe a dollar on that account. It is true she is in arrears on interest, perhaps $3,000,000 in all. The Virginia interest is about $1,500,000 in all, and she has paid an average of more than $1,300,000 each year since 1872-'73. So that Virginia has done well considering the state of her affairs, and I submit that with the present prosperity she can and will, I believe, pay her interest in full. It must be borne in mind, too——

Mr. DAWES. Has she been paying West Virginia's share?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Does the Senator know what West Virginia's share is?

Mr. DAWES. No. I know West Virginia has a share, and I wanted to know if the Senator spoke with entire confidence that Virginia would pay all her debt including West Virginia's share.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I speak with entire confidence when I say that the Virginias and their people, both of them, are honorable and honest, and will pay, if let alone, their full and equitable part of that debt. Our State will, I believe, pay her part, and in my judgment the sooner it is arranged properly the better; and I regret very much to see my friend from Massachusetts, who believes in paying all his honest debts, encouraging, as I think, a party in the old State that does not want to pay them at all.

Mr. DAWES. I cannot see any great difference. The Senator from Virginia on my right [Mr. MAHONE] says that West Virginia ought to pay one-third of the debt, and that old Virginia ought to pay the rest, and the Senator from Virginia on my left, [Mr. JOHNSTON,] when I asked him about that, said he thought West Virginia ought to pay one-third of it and old Virginia the rest. It seemed to me, therefore, that the difference between these two Senators was only this, that the Senator on my right wanted to make provision for paying that part of it, and the Senator on my left wanted to proclaim that it ought to be done.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. That is substantially what the Senator from Massachusetts said a day or two ago in his speech. I regret that the Senator from Massachusetts——

Mr. DAWES. I said it the other day because so it seemed to me, and so it seems now. I do not see any difference if you take one-third from a given sum which both of them agree was the whole, all told; if one-third is taken off by the Senator on my right and the same third by the Senator on my left, it leaves precisely two-thirds of it for the State of old Virginia to pay, with some little difference between the two Senators about the interest on it during the war. The only difference was a difference in this respect: the party to which the Senator on my left belongs had not done anything toward meeting the obligation on the two-thirds, and the Senator on my right belonged to a party that was struggling to pay that two-thirds. I do not see any other difference.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I will allow the Senator from Virginia [Mr. JOHNSTON] to answer that. It is such a strange statement that I think I would like to answer it, but I see the Senator from Virginia wants to do it.

Mr. JOHNSTON. The Senator from Massachusetts surely does not mean what he says when he says that the State of Virginia has done nothing toward paying the interest on that debt.

Mr. HOAR. May I ask the Senator a question? My colleague will pardon me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. HARRIS in the chair.) The Senator from West Virginia yielded to the Senator from Virginia. The Senator from Massachusetts now asks——

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I know the Senator from Virginia is right.

Mr. HOAR. I wish to ask the Senator from Virginia this question——

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The Senator will allow me.

Mr. HOAR. I understood I was allowed to ask a question.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] had put a question that both of us would like to answer, and I do not know why the junior Senator wants to get in another one.

Mr. HOAR. It is the same question in another form.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Do the Senator from Virginia and the Senator from West Virginia yield to the junior Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. HOAR. The question I desired to ask my honorable friend is this:

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Well, go on.

Mr. HOAR. His party came into power in the State of Virginia about 1869 or 1870. Now, suppose I had held a thousand-dollar bond of the State of Virginia when that democratic party came into power, how much of interest or principal should I have got from that day to this on that bond? That is the question I should like to ask him if he can tell me.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I will take occasion to tell the Senator. I will leave it now to the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. HOAR. Would I have got a tenth?

Mr. JOHNSTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOAR. I am glad to know it.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I will give you the figures. I have no desire to interrupt the honorable Senator from West Virginia, but on the proper occasion I will answer the question in full.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Mr. President, the two Senators from Massachusetts have a very peculiar way of coming to one another's relief. The senior Senator got himself into a snarl, I think, in trying to answer a question he did not want to answer; the junior Senator saw it and as quickly as he could got up and asked a question of my friend from Virginia.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator from West Virginia need not be alarmed at being taken out of my hands by my colleague. My colleague put a question on his own responsibility and did it so well that the Senator from West Virginia did not see any other way to answer it but to complain that it was put at all.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The junior Senator has slipped out again. I should like to have the junior Senator's attention a little while if he will remain. Neither of the Senators from Massachusetts appears to think that Virginia can do anything that is right, except——

Mr. DAWES. No, Mr. President——

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Let me go on.

Mr. DAWES. I want to correct the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. He always beats down anybody that gets up.

Mr. DAWES. No, but when the Senator misrepresents me I know there is so much courtesy beaming on every lineament of his face that he will not refuse. I never did intimate that the State of Virginia could not do anything. I only intimated that she did not.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Let us see how that is. The Senator says that the State of Virginia has not done anything, and he is referring to the debt, I take it. I have just stated—and these figures are official and show facts which neither of the Senators can question—that Virginia has paid from 1872 down to the present time an average of nearly 4½ per cent. on every dollar of her indebtedness, and on $23,000,000 of it she has paid the entire interest; and yet the Senator says she does not do anything. That is very strange talk.

Mr. DAWES. Why does not the Senator say how much of her debt she has not provided for at all, and its interest? She may have paid on specified and favored obligations of Virginia enough to make that amount; but there is a certain class of the debt of Virginia that whatever may have been her power—to which I accord everything that the Senator may say—notwithstanding her power it is nevertheless true that she has not done it.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. As I understand it there is no part of the Virginia debt, which is estimated now at $30,000,000 in round numbers, the bonds representing which have been presented to Virginia, but what has received some interest. It is true there is a preferred part, and why are those bonds preferred? It was simply because Virginia passed a bill stating to all who funded under that act that the coupons on those bonds should be receivable for taxes and all dues due the State. Every bondholder, no matter who he was, who owned the bonds had a right to fund under that act. Some bondholders preferred not to fund, and therefore they have been excluded to some extent; but I understand that every dollar of the indebtedness of Virginia has received some portion of interest.

Mr. KELLOGG. Does the Senator refer to the funding act of March, 1871?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. That is one of the acts. Then there is the consol act that I have special reference to.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator now admits that Virginia has preferred a certain class of her debt and has provided for a method of paying it, but that those who do not choose to come within that category are excluded. I do not think it is necessary for me to say anything more.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Why, Mr. President, I have not said so, nor has Virginia excluded any portion of the bondholders, as I understand. Virginia passed what is known as the funding act, and under that act any and every bondholder had a right to present his bond and get a new bond, which bond was exempt from taxation and the coupons on it receivable for taxes and all other dues due the State. A large portion, perhaps three-fourths——

Mr. DAWES. Let me ask this question: If the bondholder did not do that, did the State pay the bondholder then according to the letter of the bond?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Oh, no, of course not.

Mr. DAWES. I thought they did not.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Of course not.

Mr. DAWES. Then——

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Let me finish. It will be seen, as I have stated, that the interest paid, instead of being 6 per cent. on all the bonds, has been 4.39 per cent. Therefore that portion of the creditors who funded and took coupons, which are receivable in taxes and all other dues to the State, and non-taxable, had an advantage over the men who refused to do it or declined to do it. They have only received a part of their interest, on some portion a very small part.

Mr. KELLOGG. I desire to ask the Senator a question. I understand him to allude to the act of March, 1871. Did that act provide that two-thirds of the bonds should be represented by new bonds issued by the State of Virginia and the remaining third by an obligation to be issued, called West Virginia certificates?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. That I understand to be so.

Mr. KELLOGG. The creditor then had a bond representing two-thirds of his dollar or thousand dollars, with the qualifications and restrictions stated. Then he had a certificate of West Virginia for the other third?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. A certificate of Virginia, not of West Virginia. West Virginia has no debt and no certificates.

Mr. KELLOGG. It was called a West Virginia certificate. Assuming that West Virginia had one-half of the area of the territory, as stated by the auditor of the State of Virginia, what proportion of that debt up to the present day has your State paid?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I will answer. The Senator has misstated the facts, unintentionally, of course. He says West Virginia has one-half the territory——

Mr. KELLOGG. I say according to the report of the auditor of the State of Virginia. He makes a different statement from your authorities, I know.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I think the Senator is still mistaken.

Mr. KELLOGG. Let me read:

The first auditor of Virginia, in his report dated September 30, 1866, sets down those items as follows:

The whole number of acres of land in the State prior to its dismemberment was	50,536,039
In the fifty counties claimed by West Virginia, nearly one-half the territory of the State	23,190,815
Total white population of the State in 1860	1,047,547
In West Virginia, rather more than one-third	355,640

West Virginia has rather more than one-third of the population and nearly one-half of the area of territory, he says. I do not know that he is correct; I am reading from his report. I understand, however, that on the contrary your authorities, the authorities of West Virginia, claim that he is altogether incorrect, and that the present State of Virginia contains 41,000 square miles, and West Virginia 20,000. I think there was some dispute as to certain counties which was decided by the Suprem eCourt in 1871 or 1872, by which the line was carried over and a portion of that territory heretofore in dispute was conceded to one State. Now, drawing the line of difference about equally, it is safe to say that West Virginia has more than a third of the area and about the same proportion of population. On that basis the funding act of 1871 gave two-thirds of the bonds held by the creditors of the State in a new bond that the State of Virginia as I understand obligated itself to pay, while it assumed that the other third should be paid, upon the basis of an adjustment afterward to be determined, by the State of West Virginia.

Now, the question that I address the honorable Senator from West Virginia is, has his State paid any portion of that debt? Does it acknowledge itself to be bound for any portion of that debt? As is conceded by the commissioners of both States, by the governors of both States in their messages running over several years, and by the action of their Legislatures, the new State received one-third or nearly one-third, or one-fourth, at any rate, of the benefits that accrued from the acquisition of money into the treasury from the sale of those bonds. Did it pay anything?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The Senator has asked a long question, but I will try to answer it. In the first place, he is wrong about the amount of territory and population, and he avoids the question of the taxable property which West Virginia received in the division of the State. West Virginia did receive one-third of the territory, or about one-third. It has less than one-fourth of the population, and as I stated before less than one-sixth of the taxable property.

Now as to where the money was expended that the debt was created for, I believe that the facts are, and it is conceded in both States, that nine-tenths of the improvements for which the debt was created are now and always have been in the old State, and about one-ninth or one-tenth in the new State.

As to West Virginia paying any portion of her debt, that is the question which the Senator puts directly, and which I do not wish to avoid. I am desirous of meeting that squarely and fairly. I answer that West Virginia has paid none, and why? Has she ever refused? I defy any Senator and I invite any Senator here to show that West Virginia has at any time refused to take her fair, just, and equitable proportion of that debt. It cannot be shown by anybody.

Mr. KELLOGG. But, Mr. President——

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Wait a moment. It cannot be shown by anybody. West Virginia has always responded whenever an invitation came to her; and if the State of Virginia (about which I wish to say nothing disrespectful) and if the bondholders are satisfied to let things rest as they are, as a matter of course, in the nature of things, West Virginia will not make a fuss about it; but the facts are as I have stated, and I will state them again, that West Virginia has responded to every invitation, come from what source it might, to adjust and settle the debt. West Virginia appointed the last commission that was appointed and sent it to Richmond——

Mr. HOAR. Will my friend say if they have responded to any invitation from any holder of a bond to pay interest?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I do not know that any holder of a bond has the right to ask her, and in the next place, I do not know that any holder of a bond ever asked her, and I do not believe any ever has.

Mr. KELLOGG. Now I ask the Senator if in November, 1871, the commissioners appointed by West Virginia did not proceed to Richmond, and after ransacking all the archives of the government finally assert for themselves that the State of West Virginia did actually owe a considerable portion of that debt?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Yes.

Mr. KELLOGG. Has the Legislature of that State on their report ever provided for the payment of a dollar of that debt?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Yes, Mr. President, the State of West Virginia did appoint commissioners and those commissioners were appointed, as I have said before, upon a resolution offered by myself and unanimously, I believe, passed through the Legislature. There was no politics in it whatever. The commissioners did go to Richmond and invite the governor and the State officers of Virginia to meet them for the purpose of an adjustment and settlement, and the response was, "We have no official authority to treat with you."

Mr. KELLOGG. But did not your commissioners make a report to you?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Certainly.

Mr. KELLOGG. Did they not say you owed so much?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Certainly.

Mr. KELLOGG. Did you ever make provision for what your representatives said you owed?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. That is a strange question. That is the question the State of West Virginia has always, as I have said, been willing to meet—her just and equitable proportion of the debt.

Mr. KELLOGG. Has she done anything?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. When we have approached the party with whom alone we can treat, we have been told "I will not accept your suggestions; I do not acknowledge any official authority to come here and look into this and to make any report whatever." The commissioners who went to Richmond were three honorable, just, and high-minded citizens. They examined the matter fairly and squarely; they went as far as they could to the bottom of the question, and reported that West Virginia in round numbers owed about a million of dollars. That commission was composed of two democrats and one republican. One of the democrats was General Jackson of Parkersburgh, who had been many years in the public service and who served in the old State. The second democrat was Mr. Bennett of Weston, who had been auditor of the old State and knew well the accounts, a gentleman competent in every way to view the question. The third member was Mr. Campbell, of the Wheeling Intelligencer, a gentleman whom many of my republican friends here know to be a leading republican of my State, a man of a high order of character and intelligence, a man who has commanded the respect of the whole State. That commission reported unanimously that when they got to Richmond there was no one there to receive them or treat them with official courtesy. I do not mean that they were treated roughly or ungentlemanly, but they were not received officially and they made a report as best they could, it is true an ex parte report, because they had to do it; they could do nothing else. That was the last official act between the two States, and that was the act of West Virginia.

Mr. KELLOGG. Has there been any step, I ask the Senator, by West Virginia to meet these obligations?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. It is not worth while to take any steps. If I claim I owe the Senator $5 and he says "You do not; I will have nothing," it is not likely that I would run after the Senator to find him; but if he was willing to have me approach him and talk the matter over, I would be ready to pay him. I think I am as much of a debt-payer as anybody; I do not make exception of any one; and I believe it is the duty of every State and every individual to pay a just and honorable debt, let it be what it may. What the debt between the two States is I cannot say, because it has not been adjusted; but I believe the State I in part represent is entirely ready and willing and anxious to do her just and full proportion and pay all she owes to any bondholder of Virginia, or any one else; and I believe further that no State or individual can afford to ignore a just liability.

I think that a man who wants to look the world squarely in the face and do his full duty will at all times—whether he is able to pay may be another question—at least answer and say, "I owe and will pay when I can," and I regret very much to see my friends on that side of the Chamber encouraging a spirit that I believe will spread through the South and perhaps into the North, encouraging people to talk about readjusting and eliminating debts. That is not the company my friends there ought to be found in; they ought to be in different company; they ought to be in that company that acknowledges and is willing to pay debts instead of ignoring and eliminating them. I believe the people of the two Virginias can and will pay every dollar they owe if they are let alone and not interfered with by persons who want to ignore or eliminate part of the debt.

Mr. President, the trouble with regard to the debt of Virginia is not unprecedented; and the experience of other States should be an encouragement to those of her people who are for meeting her obligations manfully. Tennessee has just passed through a financial struggle which has resulted in maintaining her honor and financial integrity, and I have no doubt her prosperity. Illinois, Pennsylvania, Maryland, and other States whose financial standing is now above par and whose honor is beyond suspicion, have passed through fiscal struggles and maintained their integrity under circumstances much more unfavorable than Virginia has before her to-day. I am informed and believe that four-fifths of the tax-payers of Virginia are for paying the just and full debt of the State. It is the non-tax-paying people, as a rule, who oppose paying the debt in its entirety and who for political or other reasons and purposes talk about eliminating, readjusting, or repudiating. I believe a large majority of the people of the Virginias are honest and honorable and will pay every dollar of their just debts.

I hope, sir, the two States will meet before a great while and settle on an equitable basis of adjustment between them; and you will find the people inclined to take hold of it properly and pay whatever may be proper and just. I should be glad if my friends on the other side of the Chamber would lend their aid in that direction instead of lending it in a direction that I think tends to make States and people repudiate. I believe that the encouragement which that part of the people of Virginia who call themselves readjusters receive from the republicans of this Senate will spread in the State of Virginia, and it will make men less anxious to pay their honest debts. It has that tendency, and I regret very much to see it. I hope my friends will soon mend their course and let the readjuster part of the question drop.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I wonder if the sense of humor has entirely forsaken our southern brethren. There used to be a good deal of fun down in that part of the country. Those persons who had been down there generally came back with a story, and the editor's drawer of Harper's Magazine, a collection of humorous anecdotes, had a full proportion from that part of the Republic. But it is astonishing and amazing that our friends on the other side of the Senate get up and go through this talk. Why, now, just take this old State of Virginia, mother of Presidents, grandmother of the honorable Senator who has just addressed us, and with various other titles: in 1869, in December, if I am right in my recollection, she was readmitted to the Union, came in in 1870, and a creditor of the old State of Virginia would have held at that time a thousand-dollar bond payable with interest at the rate of 6 per cent., so that in the eleven years which have passed he would have been entitled, saying nothing about compounding interest, to $660 of interest. He had the promise of that worthy grandmother of statesmen and her honor to pay him that sum. She said to him by her funding bill of 1871, passed by a democratic Legislature, "If you will take two-thirds of the principal of that $1,000, throwing off $333, and 4 per cent. interest instead of 6, we will pay you the balance." So according to her offer he would have got $440, with $333 deducted from his principal, or $107, instead of the $660 he was entitled to, and that is all he would have got by her offer. I think she has paid two annual installments of interest, amounting to $120. If he had refused her offer he would have lost $440 up to this time and lost the whole of his debt, principal and interest, so far as anybody knows. But supposing, as she says, she is going to pay him some time, he would have lost up to this time of his $660, saying nothing about compounding interest, if he had taken her offer, all but $107, and if he had not taken it all but $120; and now that State and our friends on the other side turn around and hold up their hands in holy horror at General MAHONE, this awful repudiator, and at the republican party, who when there is not a majority of any party in the Senate consents to voting one of the subordinate offices to some one who believes with General MAHONE about Virginia finance! Well, now, if that is not the most ridiculous and comical position which any set of men ever undertook to maintain gravely in the presence of an intelligent people, I am mistaken.

Do our friends really think that for the sake of sustaining "the solid South" hereafter, the American people have got to forget the multiplication table and the rule of three, and that a Yankee cannot cast interest? No, Mr. President, the proposition of the junior Senator from Virginia does not come up to what the duty of the people of that State requires; the republicans of the North do not agree with him in his notions as to State finance; but it is a great deal more honorable and comes a good deal nearer to it than the proposition of the Virginia democracy.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I wish to ask my friend supposing we admit all that he says—which I do not by any means—supposing it were just as he says it is, the bondholder would have only got $107; I think he is greatly mistaken about it, but suppose it is so, and suppose his friend that he has referred to just now succeeds, how much will he get? One hundred and seven dollars? No; one-third of that will be gone. If the party that he is encouraging now succeeds, admitting all he says to be true, then one-third more goes because it is going to be eliminated, as the junior Senator from Virginia said. The debt is $30,000,000 as it stands to-day in round numbers. He says $20,000,000 is all the State can pay or ought to pay and 3 per cent. interest is all the interest she ought to pay.

Mr. HOAR. But suppose that were true, the State of West Virginia, to which I did not address myself, contents herself with these lofty pretensions of virtue and never has paid anything. While the Senator from West Virginia informs us how often they have invited Virginia to a conference and how often this, that, and the other person has been invited to consider the question, the one essential point of either of these States who between them owe this debt, inviting their creditor to come and get the money they have promised him, is absolutely lacking in either democratic State.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I certainly have no desire to mix in this discussion so far as it affects the State of Virginia or West Virginia. I think both of them are delinquent in paying what is properly due to their public creditors; but I desire to present the view taken of this question by the republicans of West Virginia. I hold in my hand a letter from the predecessor of my friend from West Virginia, who was formerly a member of this body and who was very much respected by us all, Hon. Mr. Willey, who by the way was a member of the first and second constitutional conventions of West Virginia. He recalls to my recollection a fact that I had forgotten in the previous debate, that when the question of the admission of West Virginia was under discussion in this body there was some objection made to the organization of West Virginia unless a provision was made for the payment of a portion of the debt of the old State. He says that I made that objection and that he remembers distinctly the conversation that occurred between us in that respect. I will read what he says in regard to that:

> You were a little mistaken, too, in supposing that the commissioners sent to Richmond to adjust the debt failed in consequence of a disagreement with the Virginia authorities. The fact is that Virginia would not receive or recognize the West Virginia commissioners at all; but refused to confer or treat with them on the subject in any respect whatever.
> Thus you will perceive that you had no cause to reflect upon yourself for not requiring West Virginia at the time you voted for her admission as a State, to provide for the payment of a part of the debt of Virginia, since that very provision was made in her original organic law.

In my remarks made here a few days ago I stated that that was the defect in the legislation by Congress. Then he says:

> Indeed, I have a pretty distinct recollection that while the application for admission was pending before the United States Senate you suggested to me this very matter; and that when I pointed out to you the clause in the constitution which I have above copied, you expressed your satisfaction and stated that it removed one of the difficulties which had been embarrassing you. And I say to you now, what I have frequently said to the people of West Virginia, that but for that clause in the constitution the State would never have been admitted. I say further that in my opinion no honest party or honest man in West Virginia, or out of it, will deny the obligation of West Virginia to pay an "equitable proportion of the public debt of Virginia."

Mr. Willey, it will be remembered, was a Senator representing Virginia at the time the bill to admit West Virginia was pending, and was afterward elected one of the first Senators to represent the new State. When the bill to admit West Virginia as a State was pending here, it was only passed, as I am reminded by this distinguished gentleman of West Virginia, in consequence of the express stipulation contained in the first constitution of West Virginia that that State would assume a portion of this public debt of old Virginia, to be settled between them. This clause in the constitution which was before the Senate at the time West Virginia was admitted as a State was as follows:

> An equitable proportion of the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia prior to the 1st of January, in the year 1861, shall be assumed by this State; and the Legislature shall ascertain the same as soon as may be practicable, and provide for the liquidation thereof by a sinking fund sufficient to pay the accruing interest, and redeem the principal within thirty-four years.

But for this stipulation in the constitution of West Virginia, which was submitted to the Senate at the time of the passage of the bill to admit that State, it never would have been a State in this Union. So Mr. Willey, who was its organ and representative here, says, and my recollection, although very faint and dim, is to the same effect, and the argument was then made in the Senate that this was sufficiently covered by the organic law of the State of West Virginia.

Mr. President, I have been handed two papers containing messages of the republican governors of the State of West Virginia. There was some delay in approaching this question, for reasons stated in these papers, and which I do not think it necessary to go into, but it is certain that in the years 1869, 1870, and 1871 the republican governors did do their utmost, so far as I can see, to bring about some kind of adjustment of this debt.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. My friend will allow me to say that in 1871 the governor of West Virginia was a democrat. In the fall of 1870 the State changed its political complexion and the governor after that was a democrat.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well; before the republicans lost their hold in West Virginia they provided for commissioners, and Mr. Willey states that they went to Virginia and there failed to agree; but here is the point I wish to come to: when the power departed from the republicans of West Virginia and it became a democratic State, a new constitution was framed; Mr. Willey was a member of the convention that framed the second constitution of West Virginia. Mr. Willey gives the composition of that convention:

> When the democratic party came into power in the new State it immediately called a convention to amend the constitution. That convention assembled in the winter of 1872. Only twelve of its members were republicans. All the others were democrats. This convention struck out the foregoing provision for the payment of part of the Virginia debt, and refused to incorporate in the new constitution any equivalent provision. Mr. Davis was mistaken. The only clause in the amended (democratic) constitution that can be possibly interpreted to have any reference to such debt is the following.

Which I will read in a moment. It appears that the republican party which framed the first constitution did have a specific guarantee or assumption of a portion of the debt of Virginia, the amount to be settled by future adjustment, that they took steps to bring about an agreement as to the amount, that afterward the power departed from the republicans and the democrats assumed control and the first act of the latter was to call a convention and that convention struck out this old provision upon the faith of which alone West Virginia was admitted as a State and inserted this provision in lieu:

> No debt shall be contracted by this State except to meet casual deficits in the revenue, to redeem a previous liability of the State, to suppress insurrection, repel invasion, or defend the State in time of war.

This does not contain any admission of liability for any portion of the debt of Virginia, taken in connection with the fact that they struck out the provision that did recognize the liability of West Virginia for a portion of the debt of Virginia, and taken in connection also with the pendency of a resolution then before the body denying that there was any validity, or any force, or any equity in the assumption of this claim. Now I will read what followed that:

> The fact is that this democratic convention of 1872 by a very decisive vote refused to incorporate in the amended constitution any express provision for the payment of any part of the public debt of Virginia. I give you the following extract from the journal of that convention under date of March 20, 1872, and from page 202.

The same book to which my friend referred.

> Mr. Willey moved to amend the report by adding thereto the following additional section:
> "An equitable proportion of the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia prior to the 1st of January in the year 1861 shall be assumed by this State; and the Legislature shall ascertain the same as soon as may be practicable, and provide for the payment thereof."

Here was a proposal to insert in the second constitution the old clause upon which there was a debate and a division.

> Upon which he demanded the ayes and noes. They were ordered and taken, and the amendment lost—ayes 20, noes 46.
> Every republican present and voting voted "ay" except one; all the "nays" except one were democrats.

This is the simple record that I present to the Senate of the United States at the request of some of the leading republicans of West Virginia. It does seem to me to show that the democrats in this matter have failed to observe the very condition on which the State of West Virginia was made a State.

I now, upon the statement of Mr. Willey, confidently assert that but for the fact that some provision was made in the constitution of West Virginia recognizing their liability for a portion of the public debt of the State of Virginia, that bill could not have passed. There was a good deal of controversy over the admission of West Virginia. I have always myself doubted whether it was a politic thing to do; and here it appears from the statement of this distinguished gentleman, the first Senator from that State and a member of this body when the bill passed, that at the very time that State was admitted it was only upon condition that West Virginia should by its organic act, as it had agreed to do, assume a portion of this debt. The democratic party struck out that provision by a party vote, and by a party vote refused to insert an equivalent provision in the new constitution. It seems to me, therefore, that the democratic party in that had shown its tendency to disregard public obligations, and that in this particular, as in many other cases that I might cite, it did show that it did not sufficiently recognize the importance of an observance of the public faith given by State or nation.

I make these official statements without any further comment, simply in justice to the republicans of West Virginia. It seems that I had fallen into one or two errors in my statement, not very material, when I spoke here a month or so ago, for I had no data before me at the time, and I spoke from memory. Mr. Willey corrects these errors and also gives the exact facts, and those facts are very creditable to the republican party of West Virginia; and as he says there is no one of that party so far as he knows in that State—and perhaps he says it also as to the democrats—but feels that it is his obligation, his duty, to assume a portion of the debt of Virginia. I only regret that it has not been done long before this.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Mr. President, I will say a word and then give way to my colleague. Mr. Willey, to whom the Senator from Ohio refers, is very high authority; he stands well in our State, as well as any man could possibly stand anywhere, and I should give credit to anything he would state from his recollection. It is true, as Mr. Willey has said, that there was such a provision in the first constitution of the State, and no doubt his recollection is correct as to what Congress would have done. The Senator from Ohio and all others will do me the justice to say that I have not in my remarks in the least reflected upon any republican in the State. I have stated that it never has been made a political question there; party lines have not been drawn upon it. I believe it would have been better to have inserted the old provision in the new constitution. I so stated in my remarks. If I had been there I think I would have so voted with other democrats, for there were democrats who voted for it.

Mr. SHERMAN. Only one.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Several, I beg my friend's pardon; my colleague will show directly there were half a dozen or more.

Mr. President, as to this debt question, as Mr. Willey has said, the State of West Virginia does not nor does she wish to avoid the question; she will be found ready and willing whenever the adjustment is made to take her just and equitable proportion as the original constitution contemplated. But now I want to ask my friend from Ohio who is a good lawyer as well as financier, if he does not believe that the provision in the present constitution covers the ground fully?

Mr. SHERMAN. I feel bound to say——

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. A word before the Senator answers. I do not mean as to acknowledgment, but I mean as to the recognition that she can pay or make provision to pay if anything is found due. I agree with the Senator that it would be better probably, it would certainly have acknowledged more clearly the debt, if the provision had been retained in the second constitution that was in the first; but the appeal I made to the Senator from Ohio was, is it not in his judgment the fact that the present constitution contains provision for the payment of anything that may be found due between the two States?

Mr. SHERMAN. I think not. I think the only thing that looks favorable is the public sentiment of the State of West Virginia. If the people of West Virginia feel the moral obligation of this debt, they will pay it; but there is nothing in their constitution that requires them or that even recognizes the existence of this obligation. The State had then been in existence a number of years, and it says "If there are any debts outstanding we will provide for them;" that is all, but it does not recognize the fact that there was any obligation to assume a debt that existed before the existence of the State when it is taken in connection with the vote on the proposition of Mr. Willey. There is nothing in the constitution of West Virginia now that in a court of law would be regarded as a recognition of a debt pre-existing the formation of the constitution.

Mr. KELLOGG. The first constitution provided that—

> An equitable proportion of the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia prior to the 1st day of January, 1861, shall be assumed by this State; and the Legislature shall ascertain the same as soon as may be practicable, and provide for the liquidation thereof by a sinking fund sufficient to pay the accruing interest and redeem the principal within thirty-four years.

That was stricken out by the vote the Senator from Ohio has stated.

Mr. CAMDEN. Mr. President, I will state in answer to the Senator from Ohio that of the twenty votes in favor of inserting the same clause in the constitution of 1872 that was in the constitution of 1863, there were, I think, only seven republicans voting for it and thirteen democrats; there was one republican who voted against it, the others were democrats. So that it was not in any sense a political question, and I repeat it has never been a political question in our State.

Mr. SHERMAN. That agrees exactly I think with the statement of Mr. Willey; one republican voted against his proposition; all the other republicans that were present and voting voted for it.

Mr. CAMDEN. There seem to have been seven other republicans present who voted for it; the thirteen additional votes making up the twenty were democrats.

Mr. SHERMAN. It would show, then, that the republicans were seven to one in favor of an assumption and the democrats were about four or five to one against it.

Mr. CAMDEN. That is true. The Senator will also bear in mind as to the explanation and reason for this action that the report of the commissioners was before that convention. The journal shows that a requisition for six hundred copies had been made. That report ascertained the amount due from West Virginia upon the indebtedness of Virginia to be something less than a million of dollars. The question before the convention was to provide for the payment of the amount, and not for the acknowledgment of the indebtedness. The Senator will find in the constitution of 1872, section 5 of article 10, which was not in the constitution of 1863, the provision that—

> The power of taxation of the Legislature shall extend to provisions for the payment of the State debt and the interest thereon.

Section 4 provides that the State of West Virginia shall not incur any debts or issue any bonds for any other purpose except for the purpose among others of "providing for a previous liability of the State."

These two sections of the constitution of 1872, section 5 not being in the constitution of 1863, taken together provided for issuing bonds if necessary to discharge a previous liability of the State, and gave power to the Legislature to levy taxes for the payment of those bonds and the interest upon them. It was therefore the purpose of the convention that framed the constitution of 1872 to provide for the payment of the debt as ascertained by the commissioners, and that was the point, as I understand it, that divided the two parties. One party wanted the old provision acknowledging on the part of West Virginia her liability to pay an equitable portion of the debt; the other wanted to accept the report of the commissioners and provide for the debt as ascertained.

I desire in the same connection to call attention to and to answer the question propounded by the Senators from Louisiana and from Massachusetts in this, that West Virginia had never made any proposition to the creditors of Virginia, or to Virginia herself, to pay any direct portion of this debt.

Mr. HOAR. Does the Senator allude to me as the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. CAMDEN. No; to the Senator's colleague, [Mr. DAWES.] I ask my colleague if that question——

Mr. DAWES. That West Virginia had not made any provision?

Mr. CAMDEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. DAWES. No; I did not say so.

Mr. CAMDEN. I beg pardon. I understood the Senator so.

Mr. DAWES. No; the Senator's colleague told me that I had complained of Virginia because she claimed not to be able to pay her debt. I stated distinctly that that was not what I said, but that she expressed no desire to pay it—Virginia, not West Virginia.

Mr. CAMDEN. I beg pardon; it was the Senator from Louisiana.

Now I wish to recapitulate in a few words the condition in which West Virginia was placed by the action of Virginia. In the first place, up to 1866 no action could be taken by either of the States looking to an adjustment of this debt. In 1866 Virginia passed an act withdrawing her consent to the formation of West Virginia, and soon afterward also instituted a suit to recover jurisdiction over the counties of Berkeley and Jefferson. That of necessity interrupted all negotiations between the two States. That suit was not decided until the 6th of March, 1871. In the mean time acts had been passed by the Legislature of each State authorizing commissioners on the part of Virginia first to negotiate for the return of West Virginia to the old State; secondly, for the adjustment of the public debt.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator will allow me to inquire, was not the suit between Virginia and West Virginia about the change of the line between the two States from that which was originally set up in the division by including two counties in West Virginia which before were in old Virginia? I thought that was the subject of it.

Mr. CAMDEN. All the counties of West Virginia were in Virginia before the formation of West Virginia.

Mr. DAWES. But two counties, if I remember aright, that were originally left in old Virginia, were taken into West Virginia by a change of line, and the two States had a lawsuit about that, and there was a long controversy. I unfortunately got into a newspaper correspondence with some of the West Virginia gentlemen about it myself; but that was not upon the legality of the setting up of West Virginia. While I am up I will say that I voted in the House against the setting up of West Virginia. I never believed that it was properly done. I recorded not only my vote but my earnest protest against the proceeding. But the suit to which the Senator alludes had nothing to do with that.

Mr. CAMDEN. I will answer the Senator. The act of the Virginia Legislature withdrawing her consent to the formation of the State of West Virginia was intended to go to the formation of the State itself and the admission of it; and contemplated at that time an action on the part of Virginia to revoke or annul the formation of the State of West Virginia. Afterward, however, she abandoned that ground and brought a suit to recover the jurisdiction of the counties of Jefferson and Berkeley, which she claimed had not been legally admitted into the territory of West Virginia.

Mr. DAWES. On the ground that she had never given her consent?

Mr. CAMDEN. Yes, on the ground that the consent she had given did not extend to those counties, but the counties of Berkeley and Jefferson were admitted to the State of West Virginia after the action of the first convention which formed the State of West Virginia out of the other counties embraced in its territory. However, West Virginia claimed the jurisdiction of those counties, had the jurisdiction of the counties, was exercising it, they were in possession of West Virginia, and until that suit was decided it was impossible for any adjustment to take place between Virginia and West Virginia, because they entered largely into the basis of any settlement that could take place.

I make this point for the purpose of showing that up to the 6th of March, 1871, West Virginia was powerless to make any settlement; neither was Virginia in a condition to make any settlement, because she was under the reconstruction acts of Congress by which her State government was not empowered to make any adjustment of her debts either between her creditors or between that State and West Virginia.

That brings us to the 6th of March, 1871. About that time Virginia appointed commissioners to treat with commissioners from West Virginia. West Virginia promptly met that demand and appointed commissioners to treat with the Virginia commissioners. But about the same time Virginia saw that she could make a better bargain with her creditors than she could possibly gain from any settlement with West Virginia, and within less than thirty days from the decision of the suit she passed the funding bill of the 30th of March, 1871, by which she got rid of one-third of her debt by the consent and even at the solicitation of her creditors. Virginia from that time has been placed in such a position that she cannot afford to make a settlement with West Virginia, she does not desire a settlement with West Virginia, and as long as she feels herself unable to meet promptly the interest and demands upon her for the balance of the debt, after having scaled it one-third by reason of the territory taken from her by West Virginia, she will decline to make any advances or to permit a settlement to be made with West Virginia. Therefore, after the commissioners of West Virginia had ascertained the amount that they conceived West Virginia was equitably entitled to pay upon the debt of Virginia, West Virgina had no place to offer the payment of that money.

The governor of West Virginia in submitting the report of the commissioners to the Legislature of West Virginia, referring to the report, says:

It will demand your serious consideration whether you will now proceed to assume what you may conceive to be the equitable proportion of the public debt of Virginia prior to the 1st of January, 1861, or whether you will, in the light of past events, await further action on the part of Virginia.

At that session of the Legislature the Legislature concluded to await such action as might be taken by the authorities of Virginia upon the subject. The action of the commissioners was reported to the governor of Virginia. Virginia took no notice of it, and has taken no notice of it from that time to this. Now there is no place where West Virginia can seek a settlement except through Virginia, and I am justified and authorized in saying what I have in reference to the disinclination of Virginia to make any settlement with West Virginia by the language of the governor of Virginia. In speaking of the settlement between Virginia and West Virginia, Governor Kemper, in his message of October 5, 1877, to the Legislature of Virginia, says:

Virginia can never become liable for any part of West Virginia's third, except by virtue of a settlement hereafter to be concluded between the two States. Clearly and unquestionably such a settlement is impossible to be had without the co-operation and assent of Virginia. If we ever become liable for any part of the debt thus remitted to West Virginia, then it will be no otherwise than by her own voluntary act that Virginia will incur that liability. Until the coming of the millennial era it may scarcely be supposed that one State will volunteer to assume the burdens of another State.

Mr. KELLOGG. Is that the language of the governor of Virginia?

Mr. CAMDEN. That is the language of the governor of Virginia, Governor Kemper, in his message of October 5, 1877.

Mr. KELLOGG. If the honorable Senator please, the way I read that is that Governor Mathews is the man who, calling on the governor of Virginia, Governor Kemper, says:

Until the coming of the millennial era it may scarcely be supposed that one State will volunteer to assume the burdens of another State.

Mr. CAMDEN. I beg the Senator's pardon; it is Governor Mathews quoting from the message of the governor of Virginia.

Mr. KELLOGG. It is not so marked here. I have the original document.

Mr. DAWES. I suppose it so commended itself to both governors that they both adopted it.

Mr. CAMDEN. I think if you will look at the message of Governor Kemper of the 5th of October, 1877, you will find that the language is used by Governor Kemper in his message, and it is a quotation from that message by Governor Mathews.

I think that the efforts of West Virginia have been consistent and uniform in trying to ascertain and provide for her equitable portion of this debt. That it could not be one-third of the indebtedness of Virginia is evident from the fact that the territory taken by West Virginia, as reported by the commissioners at least, was less than one-third; her population was less than one-fourth; her taxable values were less than one-sixth; and upon the basis assumed by the commissioners of distributing the debt to each State according to the benefits received by each the indebtedness is less than $1,000,000. Therefore Virginia, as is stated by her governor, was not in a position to make any settlement by which she would bring back upon her any portion of that debt, which would evidently be the case if the settlement was made at all. Therefore Virginia could not afford to make a settlement, and West Virginia can make no settlement without the consent of Virginia.

Mr. DAWES. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at two o'clock and thirty-five minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, May 4, 1881.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. MCMILLAN, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of the assignees of John Link, David Evens, and Thomas Loveless be taken from the files of the Senate and returned to the attorney of said assignees.

OFFICERS OF THE SENATE.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business of yesterday, being the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] providing for the election of certain officers of the Senate, the pending question being on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] to postpone the resolution indefinitely, upon which motion the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. DAWES. I ask that the pending resolution be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The pending resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following resolution, submitted by Mr. DAWES, March 23, 1881:

Resolved, That the Senate do now proceed to the election of its Secretary, Sergeant-at-Arms and Doorkeeper, Chief Clerk, Principal Executive Clerk, and Chaplain.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, that resolution is the only matter pending before the Senate. It is a very simple resolution. It is in accordance with the custom of the Senate from time immemorial, although in the early years of the Senate it was the custom of the Senate to hold its officers longer than latterly. The first Secretary elected by the Senate held that position until his death in 1814, and the second Secretary held his office until 1825. The Senate at that time adopted a standing rule requiring all its officers to be elected at the beginning of each Congress, once in two years. Under that rule, once in two years the officers of the Senate were elected, in the manner indicated by the rule, until the 9th of February, 1849, when, on motion of Mr. Benton, the rule was changed to the present rule, he stating that at the close of a long senatorial life of thirty years he desired to contribute that much to the ease and comfort of the Senate he was about to leave, so that Senators might be relieved at the beginning of each Congress from the importunities of a new set of office-seekers, remarking at the same time that if the rule should be changed to what it is now the Senate could, of course, at any time it desired, change its officers.

Since 1849 the rule has been as it is now; and since that time the Senate has elected officers at regular sessions of Congress, at extra sessions of Congress, and at called executive sessions of this body; so that the resolution pending before the Senate is in exact conformity to the usages of the Senate from the beginning. It was offered to the Senate on the 23d of March, and on the 24th of March it came up under the rules of the Senate for consideration, the rules of the Senate providing for and being supposed hitherto to secure to each member of the Senate and to the Senate itself the right to have the Senate itself pass under those rules upon any measure proper within its rules to be submitted to the body for consideration. It had been supposed up to that time that every Senator in this body who desired to invoke the voice of the Senate upon any matter legitimate for the Senate to consider had secured to him under the rules of the Senate the right not only to invoke that voice but to secure it.

Under that impression, sir, and endeavoring not only to conform to the usages of the Senate but to its rules, I introduced this resolution. I did not ask any Senator to support it to whose judgment it did not commend itself. I asked Senators under the rules to consider it and to pass upon it. It has encountered opposition. That opposition has held the Senate of the United States here for more than six weeks, not for the consideration of the merits of the resolution, all of which were considered and passed out of the field of debate on the first day that it was brought before the Senate. Since that time the opposition to the consideration of this measure has not been directed to its merits. It has been distinctly declared upon this floor by Senators that the Senate of the United States should never pass upon the resolution. Justification for a declaration of that kind has been sought from various sources, mostly drawn from other resolutions in the Senate but not now before it.

This resolution is distinct from, and has no connection whatever with, any other resolution pending in the Senate; but those Senators in this body who have openly declared to it and to the country that there are subjects which, though proper to be submitted to this body, they so differ with the body itself upon that this body shall never be permitted to pass upon them at all, have sought their excuse from other sources rather than in the resolution itself.

I have but to state what has been the opposition that the Senate has encountered under its rules to the proposition whether it has the power to pass upon matters proper and legitimate for it to consider—I have but to state that question to state in other words a question of graver import and importance and scope and consequence to the institutions of this country than any other which has come up for consideration in this Hall.

It matters very little what may be the fate of this resolution of itself. If it should be extinguished here in a half-hour from this time, provided it were extinguished by the methods pointed out by that Constitution which sustains us and the whole fabric of this Government, not a ripple would be discovered, and the Government would move on as if the resolution had never had any existence; but to be extinguished in the fulfillment of an avowed threat from Senators in this body that the body has no power to so control itself, that it shall not be permitted to pass its own judgment, whatever that judgment may be, upon any matter legitimate for it that any Senator in his seat shall invoke, it will be extinguished by a blow that will be felt when it falls and where it falls in this body paralyzing it, chaining it, crippling it, destroying it, and further and beyond, demonstrating to dissatisfaction and to faction and to rebellion a method and an instrumentality and a power beyond any which in open field and in open warfare would shake the institutions of this country. If it can prevail here, if a Senator in his place can declare to the Senate of the United States, "You shall never pass upon this measure," and if he has the power to carry out that threat, it can be so done at the other end of this Capitol, and at the other end of the avenue, here, elsewhere, everywhere, in a Government whose vital breath and power is the rule of the majority.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator will suspend in order that the Chair may receive a message from the President of the United States.

[A message in writing was received from the President of the United States by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries.]

Mr. DAWES. Of what avail is a message in writing from the President of the United States to this body if any Senator can get up in his place and, with impunity, and with power to enforce his threat, say to the Senate, "You shall never consider that message!" Of what avail that we come together to deliberate, to debate, if there is a power greater than the Senate itself that shall dictate with paper in hand the subjects-matter upon which we shall debate and deliberate?

I was about to say, when that message appeared at the door, that far beyond and outside of anything pertaining to the resolution itself, the resolution had come to be simply an exponent, a personification, if I may use the phrase; around it there had come together the forces of the Republic on the one side, and those forces on the other side that are not willing to submit to the rule of a majority; and it has come to assume such importance that it can never be given over. It can have no other resting place but a settlement and a determination whether this be a government and whether this branch of it be so constituted that it can control itself.

Wittingly or unwittingly, there has devolved upon the republican party anew and in a new form, but not less important, the great question whether the essence, and vitality, and value of republican institutions shall any longer continue in this land. Not willingly, yet I trust not hesitatingly, the republican party assume again the responsibility, and here and now, speaking for myself and so far as I am authorized to speak for any one else, I do declare that I continue this effort, not for anything there may be in the resolution which I offered here in March, but because around it, and with it, and on its fate, hangs the greater, living, vital issue in this country, Shall the Senate of the United States determine for itself what it shall pass upon, or shall Senators in their place have power to say to that Senate, "You never shall pass upon this, or that, or any other measure that I shall specify."

After this announcement from Senators and after the full development of the serious character of this struggle here in this body, and after it has thus been uncovered, and made to be seen by all earnest and careful patriots that this is a serious work that cannot be given over, it is necessary for us to make preparation for a systematic, a fervent, an unflinching address of all our energies and our efforts to its maintenance. In the mean time, the public service is also committed to our care. While this cannot be given over without proving false to these great principles, the public service of the country cannot be permitted also to suffer by being thus involved in this struggle here in the Senate for the maintenance of power. Indeed this struggle itself can best be carried on by girding up the loins of this Republic and strengthening all its parts and putting all its wheels in motion; for we will come to this work with more strength and assurance when everything else also is put in order and efficiency and when no other branch of the public service is permitted to suffer while our thoughts are absorbed in this great work.

We cannot fail to see that without giving it over or relaxing in one iota this great work, we must do other work also, in order that thereby our arms shall be strengthened in doing this which circumstances have made our chief work here in this session. We cannot omit to do our full duty elsewhere because we find ourselves here engaged in this struggle to maintain the authority of the Senate.

Therefore it is, recognizing this necessity and drawing from it the fact that in that way more than in any other our arm will be most strengthened in this work, I propose that the Senate address itself for a short time to other business as well as to this, never losing sight of the fact that unless we do this work, and so do it that the power of the Senate over itself will be vindicated, but coming back to it feeling that we have made ourselves stronger for it by having done that which the necessities of the Government required of us to do. I move that we now proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. BECK. On that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. PENDLETON. I ask the Senator from Massachusetts to withdraw the motion for a moment, and I will either give place to him to renew it or renew it myself.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator knows that any personal appeal to me under ordinary circumstances would be responded to most heartily. The debate has gone on for six weeks; we have tried to explain, each individual for himself, his position and its justification. It does not seem to me that it would be profitable to continue it now, and with the utmost assurance to my friend that there is——

Mr. BECK. I do not think it proper for the Senator from Ohio to disturb the funeral oration; the business is too solemn. Riddleberger and Gorham are both dead; let them rest in peace.

Mr. DAWES. I trust with the Senator from Kentucky that it is the funeral of the assertion made by him that the Senate itself should never pass upon its own work. I adhere to the motion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business, on which motion the yeas and nays are demanded.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ANTHONY, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Florida, [Mr. JONES.] I do not know how he would vote, and I refrain from voting.

Mr. BURNSIDE, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Alabama, [Mr. MORGAN.] If he were here, I should vote "yea."

Mr. FERRY, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. GEORGE.] If he were here, I should vote "yea."

Mr. WALKER, (when Mr. GARLAND'S name was called.) My colleague [Mr. GARLAND] is paired with the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.] If my colleague were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. GROVER, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. VAN WYCK.] If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. JACKSON, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. HARRISON.] I suppose he would vote "yea;" but as I am not certain as to how he would vote, I refrain from voting.

Mr. HAWLEY, (when the name of Mr. PLATT, of Connecticut, was called.) My colleague [Mr. PLATT] is paired for the remainder of the session with the Senator from Oregon, [Mr. SLATER.] If my colleague were here, I have no doubt he would vote "yea."

Mr. SAUNDERS, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. WILLIAMS.] If he were here, I should vote "yea."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. BECK. My colleague [Mr. WILLIAMS] is still absent. If he were present, he would vote "yea" on this question.

Mr. COKE. My colleague [Mr. MAXEY] is paired with the Senator from Colorado, [Mr. TELLER.]

Mr. COCKRELL. Some days ago I paired with the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] who is absent. I will ask his colleague [Mr. HALE] how would the Senator from Maine vote if he were present?

Mr. HALE. There is no objection to the Senator from Missouri voting upon this question. My colleague, if here, would vote "yea."

Mr. COCKRELL. I believe under the circumstances, then, I will vote, although I have some distrust of the propriety of the vote because of its being sustained by my good friend from Massachusetts. I will vote "yea" under the circumstances.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator will never be so happy again in the world, or any other world, as he is when he is following me. [Laughter.]

The result was announced—yeas 53, nays 0; as follows:

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After four hours and twenty-two minutes spent in executive session, the doors were reopened, and (at four o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

Prayer by Rev. JOHN CHESTER, D. D., of the city of Washington.
The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

WESTERN JUDICIAL DISTRICT OF VIRGINIA.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Attorney-General, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 28th ultimo, the answer of John F. Lewis, United States marshal for the Western District of Virginia, to the report of C. C. Lancaster, acting special agent of the Treasury Department; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, it was Ordered, That George H. Boston have leave to withdraw his papers, relating to his claim, now on the files of the Senate.

On motion of Mr. CALL, it was Ordered, That Jules Baratier be allowed to withdraw the papers in his claim from the files of the Senate.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, I congratulate the Senate upon that dispatch in the public business which enables them this morning to take up again and consider, and I trust adopt, the resolution which I submitted in March for the consideration of the Senate, and which the Senate itself have determined they will consider, whatever may have been on the part of any Senators a disposition to vote against it. I do not ask, as I said day before yesterday, any Senator to vote for it; but I deem it to be a right which I have under the rules and under the Constitution of the United States to have the Senate vote upon the resolution—just as much a right if I find that a majority of the Senate disapprove of it as I should have if a majority of the Senate approve of it. It is not because I desire that the Senate itself shall agree with me in reference to the propriety of adopting the resolution; it is because I desire the Senate to control itself. When any matter legitimate for the consideration of the Senate is proposed to it for its consideration under those rules of the Senate which the Constitution of the United States has conferred upon the Senate the power to enact, I desire that it shall not be deprived of that right here in the Senate.

Sir, if the Senate will indulge me, I invoke at your hands the protection of the Constitution of the United States in the assertion of my individual right in the Senate to a vote upon a resolution I have offered here within its rules and within its legitimate functions, and which is now the only business before the Senate.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I had hoped the Senator from Massachusetts had risen for the purpose of making a motion. We have followed the lead of that Senator for the last two or three days with great pleasure and have dispatched a large proportion of the public business for which this session of the Senate was convened. I need not remind that Senator of the fact that there is yet a large proportion of that business unconsidered and undisposed of, in view of which fact I had hoped the honorable Senator from Massachusetts would have made the motion this morning that he has made for two or three mornings heretofore. But inasmuch as the Senator failed to do so, I will make the motion that the Senate do now proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. DAWES. If it were proper for me to follow——

Mr. PENDLETON. I rise to a point of order. I think the motion to go into executive session is not debatable, as I was reminded the other day.

Mr. DAWES. So I understand.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The motion is not debatable; but the Chair has not heard what is the object of the Senator from Massachusetts in rising.

Mr. DAWES. So I inferred while the Senator from Tennessee was talking.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. HARRIS,] that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. [Putting the question.] The Chair is in doubt as to the result.

Mr. HARRIS. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. BUTLER.]

Mr. DAWES, (when his name was called.) I am not quite certain but that I am paired with the Senator from Virginia on my left, [Mr. JOHNSTON.] I will wait until the roll-call is completed.

Mr. FERRY, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. SAULSBURY.] If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. GROVER, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. VAN WYCK.] If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. JACKSON, (when his name was called.) I am paird with the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. HARRISON.]

Mr. KELLOGG, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DAVIS] on this question.

Mr. McPHERSON, (when his name was called.) I am paired with my colleague, [Mr. SEWELL.]

Mr. COKE, (when Mr. MAXEY's name was called.) My colleague [Mr. MAXEY] is paired with the Senator from Colorado, [Mr. TELLER.]

Mr. BURNSIDE, (when Mr. MORGAN's name was called.) I voted inadvertently. I am paired with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] and desire to withdraw my vote. If he were here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. SAUNDERS, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. WILLIAMS.] If he were here, I should vote "nay."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. JACKSON. My pair with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON] has been transferred to the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. GEORGE,] and therefore I vote "yea."

Mr. DAWES. I desire to state, and leave on the record, that I am paired with the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. JOHNSTON.]

Mr. SAWYER. I desire to say that I am paired with the Senator from West Virginia, [Mr. CAMDEN.]

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair is informed that no quorum has voted.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. To make a quorum I vote "nay."

So the Senate refused to proceed to the consideration of executive business.

OFFICERS OF THE SENATE.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The business before the Senate is the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] providing for the election of certain officers of the Senate, the pending question being on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] to postpone the resolution indefinitely, on which motion the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. PENDLETON. Inasmuch as the Senator from Massachusetts has told us that the business of the executive session was largely dispatched yesterday, and inasmuch as there is no desire to go into executive session to-day, and inasmuch as the committees are crowded with business, as we all know, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio, that the Senate adjourn. [Putting the question.] The ayes seem to have it.

Mr. ROLLINS. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, (when his name was called.) Upon this question I am paired with the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. BUTLER.]

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I announce once for all to-day that I am paired with the Senator from Alabama, [Mr. MORGAN.]

The result was announced—yeas 20, nays 21; as follows:

YEAS—20.

Bayard,	Farley,	Jackson,	Ransom,
Beck,	Gorman,	Jonas,	Saulsbury,
Brown,	Hampton,	Lamar,	Vance,

Jones of Nevada,	Platt of Conn.,	Slater.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. DAWES. The last two motions which have been made are dilatory motions, demonstrating still that there are Senators here who are determined that the Senate shall not control its own action. In view of that disclosure, however much I may regret it myself, and however much I fear those Senators themselves will ultimately regret it, (nevertheless it is a power which it seems Senators are determined to exert in the face of the Constitution and their oaths,) I cannot resist it further to-day, and therefore I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After two hours and forty minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and, on motion of Mr. SHERMAN, (at three o'clock and five minutes p. m.,) the Senate adjourned until Monday next.

SENATE REPORTING.

Mr. ANTHONY. I present the memorial of D. F. Murphy, Official Reporter of the Senate, representing that when he entered into the contract for reporting the debates of the Senate so long a special session of the Senate as that now convened was not contemplated, and asking for additional compensation. I move the reference of the memorial to the Committee on Printing.

The motion was agreed to.

POTOMAC RIVER FRONT.

Mr. RANSOM. I submitted some time since a resolution in reference to the Potomac flats, which was not then considered. I hope the Senate will consider it this morning. There can be no objection to the resolution, I think.

By unanimous consent, the following resolution, submitted by Mr. RANSOM on the 15th of March last, was read the second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be, and it is hereby, instructed to inquire into the condition of the Potomac River front of the city of Washington and of the navigability of said river, the effect of bridges across the same upon navigation, floods, and the health of the city, and report at the next session of the Senate what steps, if any, ought in its opinion to be taken in reference thereto; that said committee be authorized to sit during the recess of the Senate, and, if necessary, to employ a stenographer.

Mr. DAWES. I hope if anything can possibly come from such an investigation that the resolution will be adopted without objection.

Mr. RANSOM. I beg leave to offer an amendment that ought to have been embodied in the original resolution; I move to add to the resolution:

And the expenses attending such investigation shall be paid out of the "miscellaneous items" of the contingent fund of the Senate.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendment was concurred in.

The resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BANKRUPTCY INVESTIGATION.

Mr. INGALLS. I wish to call attention to the fact that when the Committee on the Judiciary were authorized to sit during the recess to consider the subject of bankruptcy they were empowered to act by sub-committee and employ a stenographer. It is found upon investigation that there is no way by which a stenographer can be paid except by the printed page, and as the work that the committee has to do will not require printing I ask that the order be so modified that the committee may employ an assistant clerk who shall also act as stenographer.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection, and the order is so modified.

TRICHINÆ IN SWINE.

Mr. COCKRELL submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That there be printed at the Government Printing Office for the use of the Senate 4,300 copies of the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury transmitting, in response to a resolution of the Senate, copies of all documents touching upon trichinæ in swine.

DEPARTMENT EMPLOYÉS.

Mr. KELLOGG submitted the following resolution; which was read:

Resolved, That the Secretaries of State, Treasury, Interior, War, Navy, and the Postmaster-General be directed to transmit to the Senate the names of all clerks and other employés borne upon their rolls respectively, together with the date of their appointment, the State to which each is charged, the person or persons upon whose recommendation they were appointed, the grade of office held, and the compensation received.

Mr. FERRY. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection being made, the resolution goes over.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. DAWES. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After fifteen minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at twelve o'clock and twenty-five minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

TRICHINÆ IN SWINE.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Committee on Printing, to which was referred a resolution for printing 4,300 copies of the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury touching upon trichinæ in swine, have instructed me to report the same without amendment, and to recommend its passage. I am also instructed to ask for its present consideration.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That there be printed at the Government Printing Office for the use of the Senate 4,300 copies of the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury transmitting, in response to a resolution of the Senate, copies of all documents touching upon trichinæ in swine.

EXECUTIVE BUSINESS.

A message in writing was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his Secretaries.

OFFICERS OF THE SENATE.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business of yesterday, being the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] providing for the election of certain officers of the Senate, the pending question being on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] to postpone the resolution indefinitely, on which motion the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After twenty-seven minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at twelve o'clock and thirty-five minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, May 11, 1881.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

Mr. DAWES. If there is no formal morning business, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. DAWES. I am requested to withdraw the motion for a moment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The motion is withdrawn.

DEPARTMENT EMPLOYÉS.

Mr. KELLOGG. I desire to call up the resolution I offered the day before yesterday which is lying on the table, and I should like to have action upon it, if action can be had without any discussion. If, however, it is likely to lead to discussion I have no disposition to press the resolution at this moment.

Mr. MORRILL. There will be some discussion unless the Senator modifies it.

Mr. KELLOGG. I thought I would defer to the Senator from Vermont and perhaps other Senators with respect to suggestions of amendment.

Mr. HOAR. Let it go over.

Mr. KELLOGG. Let it go over, then, until to-morrow; so that Senators can examine it.

Mr. McDILL. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Official Register of the United States shall hereafter include, in addition to the statistics required by section 510 of the Revised Statutes, information as to the congressional district from which each officer, clerk, employé, &c., in the service of the United States, is appointed, and the original date of such appointment.

Mr. SHERMAN. As that relates to the same matter as the resolution offered by the Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. KELLOGG,] I think it had better go over and be taken up when the other resolution is considered.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that the resolution relates to the same matter.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let it go over until to-morrow, and we can then take them up together.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution goes over.

Mr. DAWES. I renew my motion for an executive session.

Mr. BROWN. Will the Senator from Massachusetts indulge me one moment before making that motion?

Mr. DAWES. Yes, sir.

Mr. BROWN. If it be in order, I desire to offer an amendment to the resolution submitted by the Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. KELLOGG,] and I ask that it lie on the table until to-morrow and come up with the resolution to be considered with it.

Mr. DAWES. And printed, I suppose.

Mr. BROWN. And printed with the resolution. After the word "all," in the third line, I move to insert "officers;" so as to read, "officers, clerks, and other employés;" after the word "respectively," in the fourth line, to insert "and the salary paid to each;" and then at the end of the resolution to add "and whether each of said officers, clerks, and employés is white or colored;" so as to make the resolution read:

Resolved, That the Secretaries of State, Treasury, Interior, War, Navy, and the Postmaster-General be directed to transmit to the Senate the names of all officers, clerks, and other employés borne upon their rolls, respectively, and the salary paid to each, together with the date of their appointment, the State to which each is charged, the person or persons upon whose recommendation they were appointed, the grade of office held, and the compensation received, and whether each of said officers, clerks, and employés is white or colored.

I desire that the resolution be printed, as proposed to be amended, by to-morrow morning.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, the order to print will be made.

M'DONALD'S COMPILATION OF QUESTIONS OF ORDER.

Mr. MORGAN submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate is hereby authorized and directed to pay to the legal representative of W. J. McDonald, deceased, the sum of $300 for "a compilation of questions of order and decisions thereon," prepared by the said W. J. McDonald, deceased; the same to be paid out of the miscellaneous items of the contingent fund of the Senate.

SENATE REPORTING.

Mr. ANTHONY. I beg leave to make a report from the Committee on Printing. The Committee on Printing, to which was referred the memorial of Mr. Murphy, the Official Reporter of the Senate, asking that an allowance be made for reporting the debates of the present special session, have instructed me to report the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, directed to pay the Official Reporter, out of the miscellaneous items of the contingent fund, for reporting the debates and proceedings of the present special session, the sum of $2,500.

If there be no objection, I ask for the present consideration of this resolution.

By unanimous consent, the resolution was read twice and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Senate entered into a contract with the Official Reporter for reporting the debates at the same price paid to the Reporters of the House, $25,000 a year, it having been ascertained that the printed debates were about the same in each House. This long special session of the Senate was not contemplated when the contract was made; and although the Reporter has no legal claim upon the Government, he certainly has an equitable claim upon it, and one which I think will commend itself to the Senate. The amount of work for this session at the rate fixed by the Committee on Contingent Expenses for the reporting of testimony taken by committees would amount to about $3,000 thus far; but as a special session of about a fortnight might have been anticipated when the contract was entered into, the committee have reduced the amount to $2,500. I presume there will be no objection to the allowance.

The resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. DAWES. I renew my motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After four hours and ten minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at four o'clock and twenty minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

THURSDAY, May 12, 1881.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

DEPARTMENT EMPLOYÉS.

Mr. KELLOGG. I desire to call up the resolution I offered on the 9th instant. I should like very much to have it disposed of this morning. I ask the Chief Clerk to read the resolution together with the amendments that have been submitted.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretaries of State, Treasury, Interior, War, Navy, and the Postmaster-General be directed to transmit to the Senate the names of all clerks and other employés borne upon their rolls, respectively, together with the date of their appointment, the State to which each is charged, the person or persons upon whose recommendation they were appointed, the grade of office held, and the compensation received.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I should like to ask the Senator from Louisiana who submitted the resolution, if he does not wish to include the office of the Attorney-General? I believe all the Departments except the Department of Justice are included. Would it not be well to include that, so as to have the list complete?

Mr. KELLOGG. If the Senator from West Virginia will suggest that amendment, I shall have no objection to it.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I suggest that the Department of Justice be added, if the resolution is to pass. I should not have moved the resolution, but I suggest that amendment. I ask the Senator, also, whether it is intended to include the Printing Bureau?

Mr. KELLOGG. It is not so intended.

Mr. ALLISON. I only desire to say that the resolution would require a vast amount of information, and I do not believe it is possible to secure that information unless we also accompany the resolution with a proper appropriation for clerks to obtain and compile it. It seems to me it would be unwise to pass the resolution at this session.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I have not the law before me; but under existing law there is provision made for an Official Register, which contains the names of all Government employés, the date of their appointment, and all the other information here called for, except one thing; and that publication is made every two years. It is a very expensive document, which is published by order of Congress, in pursuance of law, and is furnished to the different Departments and to Congress in limited numbers. It contains all the information that this resolution calls for, except the names of the persons recommending appointments. To pass the resolution would not only duplicate all this vast labor and precipitate it probably before the time fixed by law for furnishing the Biennial Register, but would cost many thousands of dollars. The cost of printing the Blue Book, as it is called, the Official Register, is very large, because it is all in what printers call tabular form, which is more expensive.

Mr. HAWLEY. Rule and figure work.

Mr. SHERMAN. Rule and figure work. I am not a printer, and therefore I did not know the technical term; but it is a very expensive book, and printed only in limited numbers to supply such demand as is made upon the Departments. To pass this resolution would involve the Government in considerable expense, and there is no appropriation to meet it. It would require the aid of a great many clerks unless you would take merely the old Biennial Register and revise it and print that. My friend [Mr. FERRY] has found the law for me. Here is the law, a permanent law, as old as 1816:

SEC. 198. The head of each Department shall, as soon as practicable after the last day in September in each year in which a new Congress is to assemble, cause to be filed in the Department of the Interior a full and complete list of all officers, agents, clerks, and employés employed in his Department, or in any of the offices or bureaus connected therewith. He shall include in such list all the statistics peculiar to his Department required to enable the Secretary of the Interior to prepare the Biennial Register.

That gives the date of appointment, the compensation, and all the other materials. That work is to be issued next September according to law, and this would only precipitate an imperfect work of the same character. I am opposed to the resolution entirely unless Senators really want to have in print the names of those who recommend the various Department employés. All the most valuable of these officers have held their offices for three, four, or five years, and some of them twenty years, and there are some of them who have been there even for fifty years. The men who recommended them are dead and gone; and yet to turn them out because their influence is not still in active life would be unjust and wrong. It would only give a handle to enable persons seeking office to get out men who are valuable for their long public service. If the names of all who indorsed the papers of the different clerks or employés should be printed it would require about two or three volumes, I should think.

I therefore am opposed to the whole resolution however it may be amended. It is unnecessary. I think the law already provides for all the information which is required. If there is any particular case which the Senator from Louisiana or any other Senator wishes to get at, all he has to do is to write a letter to the proper Department and he will get the information as to who recommended an employé and why he is retained in office.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I move that the Sergeant-at-Arms be instructed to have the galleries and committee-rooms in the rear of the galleries cleared when we go into executive session to-day. I make this motion so that during the executive session the doors can be kept open. I ask unanimous consent that that be done.

Mr. HARRIS. I did not hear the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I asked that the Sergeant-at-Arms be instructed to clear the galleries and the committee-rooms in the rear of the galleries prior to the executive session, so that we may have the doors open during the executive session to-day. It is not without precedent; it was done during the Belknap trial, and adds very much to the comfort of Senators in warm weather.

Mr. HARRIS. I shall have no objection to that.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection, and that order will be made. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. DAVIS] to the resolution of the Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. KELLOGG.]

Mr. BAYARD. I should like to know whether the Senator from Ohio, in discussing the resolution of the Senator from Louisiana, proposed to refer it to the Committee on Printing, for instance. I understood him to comment upon the great cost of executing the work called for by the resolution, and I entirely concur with him in considering it a very grave matter whether the resolution should be executed in its present form, which would be something more than a reduplication of the Blue Book, the Register of the Government. How far it would be swollen by publishing the list of names of persons who make recommendations to office, I cannot now tell. I should suppose that there would be more names of the parties recommending than there would be of the persons recommended, and that you would have a most voluminous document in case you attempted to carry out the resolution here proposed by the Senator from Louisiana.

I suggest that this resolution be referred to the Committee on Printing. It may be a much greater undertaking than is apparent upon its face. There are in the Departments a number of the most valuable of the public officers who have been there for many years, fifteen or twenty years, or longer; and yet this would require that the letters of recommendation of the persons upon whose application they were placed in office should be taken from the files and the names extracted now and published. I merely suggest that, to show the very indefinite nature of the inquiry suggested and the very great expense and difficulty of executing it. I think, therefore, this resolution had better go to the Committee on Printing, so that they may report to the Senate not only the money cost of executing it, but the great inconvenience that would be given in all the Departments by complying with it.

There is, I may say, another resolution on our table, offered by the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. McDILL,] which it seems to me would more easily and regularly reach the proper object, by designating congressional districts from which the appointments were made and making the action future and not applicable to the past; that is, in all future editions of the Official Register these names shall be contained and the places from which the parties were originally appointed shall be stated. I have not the slightest objection, but, on the contrary, I should greatly prefer that the Official Register of the United States should indicate the localities which have been favored or which have been neglected in the matter of the appointments of officers; but I really believe the Senate had better think twice before they hastily order an edition, a re-edition, of the Blue Book with such additions as will at least treble its present volume, because if you publish the names of all the people who recommended every officer, petty and great, for his position, you will find a very long index necessary.

I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. BROWN. Will the Senator be kind enough to withdraw the motion for a moment?

Mr. BAYARD. Certainly, if there be any occasion to do so.

Mr. HARRIS. The motion is debatable, and the Senator need not ask to have it withdrawn.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia.

Mr. BROWN. I cordially approve of the objects of the resolution. I am inclined to think there is some good reason in what has been said by the Senator from Ohio and also the Senator from Delaware as to the cost of its immediate execution, and I think it probable the object could be better accomplished by adopting the resolution of the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. McDILL,] properly amended, and let this information be given when the Blue Book is again published, which I understand is to be next September.

I should like, therefore, when the resolution of the Senator from Iowa comes up for action, to move the amendment to it that I moved yesterday to the resolution of the Senator from Louisiana, that in addition to the information usually given in the Blue Book there be a statement as to whether each employé, clerk, or officer is white or colored. I think, for reasons which I gave on a former occasion upon this floor, it is proper that that information should go to the country. I stated then that more than one-fourth of the whole number of votes given for the republican party were cast by colored men, if the colored people are solid, as claimed, for the republicans; and usually they are so. There are exceptions, it is true. I stated then that they had received a very small share of patronage; that many of them were becoming educated, men of ability, men of learning, men of intelligence, who are competent to fill positions in some of these Departments, and that very little had been given to them. I think it would be proper in publishing the next Official Register that that information should be added to the information which is usually given; that it should not only state the place or congressional district from which the appointee comes, and I think very properly the persons by whom he is recommended, but also that it should state whether each is white or colored. I can see no objection to the information going to the country, and it seems to me it is but just that the colored people and the whole people of the United States should be enabled on looking at the Register to see how they have fared in this distribution.

Therefore I approve the objects of the resolution most cordially, but I incline to think with the Senator from Delaware that the resolution of the Senator from Iowa, properly amended, would best subserve the object and save expense that might be very heavy in carrying out the resolution of the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. KELLOGG. I have no special desire that this resolution should be adopted immediately and in its present form. My chief object was to call the attention of the Senate to the subject-matter of the inquiry, not with a view of merely agitating the subject, but if possible to devise some way of securing and bringing to the notice of the Senate information that I think is very important and information that in justice should be made public.

It seems to me that for the Senator from Ohio to say that the same information is contained in the Blue Book as is proposed to be disclosed by this resolution, is entirely a mistake. I may say in passing that the Blue Book is only printed to a limited extent, a limited number being furnished by the Government, sufficient to give each member of Congress and the heads of the different Departments and perhaps the different bureaus of the Government one copy each, it being published by the Secretary of the Interior. No information can be obtained through this authority except by an appeal to it in the hands of the heads of Departments, members of Congress, and other especially favored persons. All the information contained in the Blue Book is or purports to be the name of the person employed, the office in some cases to which he is appointed, the State from which he is said to have been appointed, and where he was born. The time of employment or appointment is not indicated; neither is the district from which the person is appointed indicated. In order to ascertain this meager and uncertain information one must search carefully through many pages of this book, arranged as it is. The very object of the law of 1876 in regard to the largest Department is frustrated, which provides—

> That on and after January 1, 1876, the appointments of this Department shall be so arranged as to be equally distributed between the several States of the United States, Territories, and the District of Columbia, according to population.

It is impossible to ascertain by this Blue Book, as it is called, whether this law has been complied with. As a matter of fact, I am informed, and believe, that in most of the Departments it has not been complied with either in letter or in spirit.

Mr. SHERMAN. If my friend will allow me, that law applies to none other than the Treasury Department.

Mr. KELLOGG. I was about to say that this law in terms applies to none other than the Treasury Department; but section 1754 of the Revised Statutes and the similar succeeding sections seem to imply that the same doctrine shall be recognized by other Departments as well as the Treasury Department.

Mr. CONGER. Will the Senator read the section to which he refers?

Mr. KELLOGG. Section 1754 provides that—

> Persons honorably discharged from the military or naval service by reason of disability resulting from wounds or sickness incurred in the line of duty, shall be preferred for appointments to civil offices, provided they are found to possess the business capacity necessary for the proper discharge of the duties of such offices.

That seems to apply to other Departments as well as the Treasury Department, although the law of 1876 only applies to the Treasury Department. My object is not to set a movement on foot to thrust any one out of the Departments—nothing of that kind. I do not want to see any one removed, especially a good officer; but I want to see appointees charged to the States to which they belong. If it be true that there are scores, to say the least, of males and females employed in the Treasury and other Departments in this city who really reside in Northern States or in the District of Columbia, who never resided in a State south of Mason and Dixon's line in their lives, who are charged to the Southern States, I think that wrong should be righted.

As to the matter of the expense, I addressed a communication to the Secretary of the Treasury some two weeks since. I am informed by other Senators that they also addressed similar communications to the Secretary of the Treasury. One Senator informed me that he sent a communication to the Secretary of the Treasury six weeks or two months since asking for this same information and he tells me that he has received no reply to the present moment. I did receive a reply, and all the information that I asked for, which is the information asked for by this resolution, was contained in his reply to me touching the State of Louisiana, and it covered hardly two pages of ordinary letter paper. Every iota of information was furnished except that suggested by the amendment of the Senator from Georgia as to whether the clerk or employé or attaché of the Department is white or colored. It was exceedingly brief and to the point, and disclosed the fact that there were persons charged to Louisiana who never resided in the State, or if they had ever resided there had no present identification with the State nor had had for years. I am told by other Senators that the same thing exists in the Departments in this city in respect to their States. One Western Senator told me yesterday that the State he represents is entitled to over sixty appointments, and I think some twenty-five or thirty only are credited to that State, and it is a State that furnished as many or more soldiers during the late war in proportion to its population than almost any other State in the Union, and I think he believes that a number are charged to that State who do not belong to the State. Members of Congress are constantly complaining, and with some degree of justice I think, that appointments are charged to certain States and districts that they represent, in different States of the North as well as of the South, that do not belong to their districts or to their States.

Is it improper that these facts should be disclosed? If it be true—I do not say it is—that the chiefs of bureaus who have been in these Departments for many years have been in the habit of placing favorites in the Departments and charging them to States whose quota is not full, and if the record discloses that there are no papers on file and that there is nothing to show by whose influence those persons were appointed, I think that is a fact which if it be true ought to be brought to the attention of the Senate and of the country.

How is it possible for us to know these facts from the information contained in the Blue Book alone? If the information called for by the resolution should be furnished to the Senate it would not occupy much space. I have referred to the fact that I procured the same information in regard to Louisiana, and that it only covered two sheets of paper. If the same information shall be furnished in regard to all the States and printed in pamphlet form Senators can and will distribute it so that every one who choose would have an opportunity to examine it, and you would ascertain the truth in regard to all these matters. Surely no one need fear the truth who desires to correct an injustice and a wrong. But the Blue Book is a sealed book. Every one knows that it is practically a sealed source of information except to a comparative few; the masses cannot get hold of it. Every Senator knows that he is constantly applied to for information found in the Blue Book meager as that is in comparison with what I think we are entitled to receive and know in regard to appointments in the Departments, and he has constantly to turn to the Blue Book, having but one copy, for information, or else he must loan his book out to individuals here and there, and when the information is sought then it requires considerable research and care to procure it.

Let this be a public document. Let it come in as a letter from each of the Departments and be published in pamphlet form and laid upon our table, and you will soon see whether there is any reason for this information. You will soon see whether there is favoritism in the Departments. Every Senator or member, when his neighbor, his friend, or a constituent in his district or in his State shall receive one of these copies, will get by return mail information as to whether the person charged to his State or to his district is in fact properly charged thereto.

While I am on my feet I want to call attention to another matter. Among other evils that might be remedied, though it does not pertain to this resolution, is this: if I am informed correctly, during the past two or three years of the administration of the departments of this Government, the heads of bureaus charged with delicate and onerous duties, with great responsibilities, such as counting money or accounting for moneys, who heretofore had always, by all rules and precedents, been permitted to designate to the approving power the persons under them charged with such delicate and responsible duties, for which these chiefs of bureaus alone are responsible, having given bond for the faithful performance of those duties, have been compelled to receive into their offices appointees designated by their chiefs, or in some way by some power about their chiefs, not with their concurrence. I am told that it is a fact that to-day some chiefs of bureaus, who until within the past two or three years were allowed to designate their subordinates, to-day, reversing the precedents and rules that have obtained and been recognized since the foundation of the Government, their subordinates are put upon them irrespective of their wish or recommendation.

If there is no foundation for all this it can soon be ascertained, and I shall be glad of it. If there is cause of complaint, a few score pages of printed matter won't bankrupt the Government.

Let the resolution go to the Committee on Printing; let them report as to the probable expense of printing this matter, much of which certainly is not contained in the Blue Book. I do not care particularly about the recommendations; I do not care as to who recommended the employés so much; amend the resolution by striking that out; but I suggest that where there are no papers on file and where there are no recommendations, that fact should be known. When that is known it is easy to ascertain who are behind these appointees and what influence caused them to be appointed, perhaps from one State and charged to a congressional district in another State. This is information that I think it is proper the Senate and the country should have. If I am wrong in regard to these matters—and I speak from information—I shall be glad, as I have said, to know it. If I am right the Senate ought to know it and the country ought to know it.

I repeat, there is no desire so far as I know to push out of office good clerks, but to correct abuses and injustice in the disposition of the patronage of the Departments wherever it may exist.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, I regard this as a question of very minor importance. What is important to the country is that we should have efficient officers and efficient clerks. Take the State Department with Mr. Hunter, or the Post Office Department with Mr. Marr, or with Mr. Smith, men who have been there for more than forty years; is it desirable to go back and inquire who recommended those men? Do we not know that they are valuable officers to the various Departments, that they are fitted to the service, that their services could not be dispensed with without immense loss, and that they are competent for nothing else, and if they were deprived of their salaries they would be subject possibly to the charities of the world?

It strikes me that what this resolution calls for would make a document of immense bulk and of very little value. Do we not know that Senators pass around the Chamber, go to the House of Representatives, and get dozens of men to indorse an application in behalf of somebody for an appointment? Since the law of 1875 was passed for the Treasury Department, of course none of the Northern States have had any appointments made there. As fast as there have been vacancies in consequence of death or resignation, all the appointments for the Treasury Department have been made from the Southern States. But it does seem to me that this is a matter that ought not to engage very much the attention of the Senate of the United States. We ought to be regardful whether the service of each department is performed as it ought to be.

I therefore shall vote for the reference of the resolution to the Committee on Printing, and I hope they will report adversely to it, for I do not see any good that can arise from it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Delaware, that the resolution of the Senator from Louisiana be referred to the Committee on Printing.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. McDILL. I should like to call up the resolution I offered yesterday morning, and ask that it also be referred to the Committee on Printing.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution offered yesterday by the Senator from Iowa will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Official Register of the United States shall hereafter include, in addition to the statistics required by section 510 of the Revised Statutes, information as to the congressional district from which each officer, clerk, employé, &c., in the service of the United States, is appointed, and the original date of such appointment.

Mr. BROWN. I desire to offer an amendment to the resolution of the Senator from Iowa, and ask that it also be referred to the committee—to add at the end of the resolution "and whether each of said officers, clerks, and employés is white or colored."

Mr. HOAR. I do not wish to debate this matter, but I should like to make one suggestion, as the Senator from Georgia has introduced that amendment, which, perhaps, may have weight with the committee that consider it, and may possibly have some weight with him.

A gentleman whom I have been in the habit of following on political questions introduced a proposition at the last session of Congress to require the President to appoint a certain number of colored persons as cadets at West Point. I resisted it very earnestly, although it received the support of a majority of my own party, on the ground that it required the President, the appointing power, to be thinking of the differences of race in this country when he ought to forget them.

Now it seems to me, and I suggest it to my distinguished friends from the South if any suggestion of mine can have the least weight in their minds, that what we want to do in this world is no more to think of race-differences in regard to political offices or elections than we do of the differences between blue-eyed men and black-eyed men, or the differences between men with grey beards and men without beards, or any other differences whatever between persons. I submit that is a reasonable suggestion.

It is quite possible that the Senator from Georgia may make a point and a good point on his political antagonists. He may get some information which will enable him to go into some canvass or make a speech here in the Senate by which he will show that the republican party who attack him and his friends for not doing justice to the colored men, do not do justice to the colored men themselves. Be it so; he is going to make a good strong point, and make us feel cheap. But is it worth while, for the sake of getting the advantage in that way instead of some other way, if the fact be true, to incorporate in our legislative proceedings, in our political statistics—I do not mean the social statistics by which we get the nativity and place of birth and race of everybody, which it is very important to have for scientific purposes—but in our political statistics and discussions the question whether the men of Irish birth, or the men of German birth, or the men of Southern birth, or the men of African birth or descent get their precise share of the offices, as compared with other classes of Americans; we are all Americans; we are all equal under the Constitution and the laws; and for one, though perhaps I am sometimes in debating with my political opponents hurried into the very fault or error which I am dealing with, I propose, if I am conscious of it, to resist any attempt to consider these insignificant differences between men in regard to their rights to hold office; and I hope that on reflection the honorable Senator from Georgia will himself see that whether I have myself been a traitor to this principle or not, or whether we all have been on this side of the Chamber, that is the sound principle.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, I am very happy to learn that my friend, the Senator from Massachusetts, has reached a point where he is willing in future to say less about race and color than has been said again and again for the last fifteen or twenty years by him and his political associates. It has not been the habit, I believe, of those who agree with him on this floor for a number of years past to ignore entirely the white line and the colored line, especially the colored line. In our constitutional amendments, our civil-rights bills passed by Congress, our reconstruction acts, and the various other legislation, the colored race has been very carefully taken care of. It has always been held out to them that they got their rights from the Republican party or by its agency, that it was their particular and peculiar friend, and that they ought under all circumstances to stand by and act with that party, and as a mass they have done so; it is not for me to say whether wisely or unwisely. That is for them to judge. But they have now reached a point where, as I have already stated, many of them are intelligent, educated, many of them are men of ability; they think they are entitled to participate under a republican administration in the offices that are to be distributed or disposed of; they think, as I learn from some of their representative men, that they have not been fairly and justly treated in this regard, and as we have had the colored line drawn all along in the legislation of the country for fifteen years past, or at least have had reference to the races in almost all party legislation, it seems to me it would not mar the beauty of the Blue Book in future to have a simple column, as there are already a number of columns on each page, added in which it would be stated whether each officer, clerk, or employé is white or colored. This would show to the country how much the republican party has appreciated the services of the colored race and how much they have rewarded them for these services. Then, I see no harm it could do in any case.

The Senator from Massachusetts said that we do not take any note as to whether a man is a German or an Irishman. We have not, in the legislation for fifteen years past, drawn that distinction, but we have made notes in reference to the African race. Therefore, as the legislation of Congress for so long a time has drawn distinctions in favor of that race, when it did not speak of the Irish race or the German race, or any other except the colored race, I think it is only carrying out the law or policy that has obtained for a long time to let the Blue Book state in each case whether the officer or employé is white or colored. I therefore insist on my amendment to the resolution of the Senator from Iowa, and desire it to go before the Committee on Printing.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Iowa to refer the resolution to the Committee on Printing.

The motion was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The proposed amendment will be referred to the same committee.

PRESIDENTIAL ELECTIONS.

Mr. HOAR. I offer the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on Privileges and Elections be directed to inquire and report at the next session of Congress what measures are needful to secure the ascertainment and declaration of the result of elections of President and Vice-President of the United States.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. The Senator says that the committee shall report at the next session. When shall the committee consider that matter? Is it to be done in recess, and if so, how?

Mr. HOAR. I will state to the Senator from Georgia that my idea was that the committee would meet soon, possibly appoint a subcommittee before we adjourn; and it was merely to charge the members with the responsibility of examining the subject that I offered the resolution. I do not suppose that any work can be done by the committee except as individuals until next December; but the object was merely to have the direction given.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts in that event there ought to be authority for the sub-committee to sit during the recess.

Mr. HOAR. If the committee on meeting within a few days shall think it worth while to ask for that authority, that can be done then.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Very well.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The subject embraced in this resolution has always hitherto in this body been considered either by the Committee on the Judiciary or by a select committee appointed for that purpose, with one exception, I think when Senator Morton was the chairman of the Committee on Privileges and Elections. I think that he reported a bill from that committee. However, the Committee on the Judiciary, I presume I can safely say, has no desire to consider anything that the Senate is willing to relieve it from.

I merely call attention to the circumstance that for the last four years at least the matter has been thought to be of so much importance that a large select committee has been raised from time to time charged with that special and exclusive duty. Perhaps the matter has been so far discussed and reduced to its bearings that such a committee is now unnecessary. I do not make any opposition to the resolution; I only rose to suggest what had been heretofore done.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. DAWES. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five hours spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at five o'clock and fifty-three minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

FRIDAY, May 13, 1881.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE MANSION.

Mr. HOAR submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds be directed to inquire into the sanitary condition of the Executive Mansion; that they have leave to sit during the recess, to examine witnesses, and employ a stenographer.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. DAWES. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I move that the same order which was made yesterday in reference to the opening of the upper doors in executive session be made from day to day until further ordered.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection, and that order will be made.

Mr. DAWES. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After forty-nine minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at twelve o'clock and fifty-six minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

MONDAY, May 16, 1881.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday last was read and approved.

WESTERN JUDICIAL DISTRICT OF VIRGINIA.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter of the Attorney-General, transmitting the exhibits of John F. Lewis, United States marshal for the western district of Virginia, which should have accompanied his letter of the 5th instant, in response to Senate resolution of April 28, 1881, and requesting that the original documents be returned to the Department of Justice after they have been printed; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. COCKRELL. I call the attention of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. JOHNSTON] to the communication. I understand that the previous communication has been printed; I think I have seen it on our desks; and it might be well that this paper should be printed also.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

RESIGNATION OF THE NEW YORK SENATORS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following communications; which were read and ordered to lie on the table:

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 16, 1881.

SIR: Will you please announce to the Senate that my resignation as Senator of the United States from the State of New York has been forwarded to the governor of that State?

I have the honor to be, with great respect, your obedient servant,

ROSCOE CONKLING.

Hon. CHESTER A. ARTHUR, Vice-President.

SENATE CHAMBER, WASHINGTON, May 16, 1881.

SIR: I have forwarded to the governor of the State of New York my resignation as Senator of the United States for the State of New York. Will you be pleased to announce the fact to the Senate?

With great respect, your obedient servant,

T. C. PLATT.

Hon. CHESTER A. ARTHUR, Vice-President.

ISTHMUS SHIP-CANALS.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I am instructed by the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the resolution relative to transportation across the isthmus, to report it back without amendment, accompanied by a written report. I ask that the resolution and report be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following resolution, submitted by Mr. MORGAN April 27, 1881:

Resolved, That the interests of the people of the United States of America and the welfare and security of their Government are so involved in the subject of the construction of ship-canals and other ways for the transportation of sea-going vessels across the isthmus connecting North and South America that the Government of the United States, with the frankness which is due to all other peoples and governments, hereby asserts that it will insist that its consent is a necessary condition-precedent to the execution of any such project; and also as to the rules and regulations under which other nations shall participate in the use of such canals or other ways, either in peace or in war.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The report will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the resolution on the construction of ship-canals across the Isthmus of Darien, having had the same under consideration, report:

That the subject embraced in the resolution is one of great national importance, and worthy of the most careful consideration. The resolution is as follows:

"Resolved, That the interests of the people of the United States of America and the welfare and security of their Government are so involved in the subject of the construction of ship-canals and other ways for the transportation of sea-going vessels across the isthmus connecting North and South America that the Government of the United States, with the frankness which is due to all other peoples and governments, hereby asserts that it will insist that its consent is a necessary condition-precedent to the execution of any such project; and also as to the rules and regulations under which other nations shall participate in the use of such canals or other ways, either in peace or in war."

This resolution was unanimously reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations by Hon. William W. Eaton, its chairman, at the last session of the Senate, but was not acted upon for want of time, and was again brought before the Senate, at this session, by the Senator from Alabama, [Mr. MORGAN.]

Certainly the United States cannot remain silent and acquiescing spectators and see any European government or corporation monopolize the control of a great route for the transportation of ships across the Isthmus of Darien. It is an affair of vital importance to those who dwell on the Atlantic and on the Pacific coasts, as well as to the people of our whole country.

President Monroe, a wise and discreet man, announced, in a public message to Congress, in December, 1823, that "the American continents, by the free and independent condition which they have assumed and maintained, are henceforth not to be considered subjects for future colonization by any European power." This declaration has since been known as the "Monroe doctrine," and while it does not directly apply to the construction of an interoceanic canal, the principle underlying it, which principle lies at the very foundation of our public welfare and safety, leads us to the announcement of the doctrine contained in this resolution.

This "Monroe doctrine" has received the public and official sanction of subsequent Presidents, as well as of a very large majority of the American people. At different times Great Britain has attempted to secure a foothold on the Isthmus of Darien, which it is now proposed to pierce with a canal, and each time she has been forced to abandon the project, so earnest and firm was the resistance offered by the Government of the United States. Hon. Reverdy Johnson, who was the Attorney-General of President Taylor, thus alludes to one of these attempts to found a British colony on the isthmus in a letter addressed to Hon. John M. Clayton, December 30, 1853. "President Taylor," wrote Mr. Johnson, "had firmly resolved, by all constitutional measures in his power, to prevent such aggression if any should be attempted, considering, as he did, that all the passages through the isthmus should be kept free to enable us to retain our possessions in the Pacific."

By the passage of this resolution we simply serve a notice to the world that, in the opinion of the Senate of the United States, the peace, safety, and general welfare of this Republic require that it should be consulted concerning, and should have a voice in, the management of any canal or other way for the transportation of sea-going vessels across the Isthmus of Darien.

We do not express any doubts as to our rights, or suggest any reference of the subject to an international tribunal, because in this matter we are absolutely in the right. We simply ask nations who may directly or indirectly send their subjects, citizens, or capital to the isthmus that they obtain the consent of the United States, as the power most directly interested, and that the rules and regulations for the government of this interoceanic highway be made acceptable to us, whose interests, in peace as in war, they will so materially affect.

Another reason for the passage of this resolution is, that companies have been and others may be formed for the construction of projected routes, which it is well known can never be successfully operated under their present plans, and in which the money subscribed will be totally lost. Yet many of the subscribers have undoubtedly been led to believe that the United States Government approved—indirectly, if not directly—the scheme in which they have invested. This should not be. No one, at home or abroad, should be beguiled into the investment of accumulated property or of hard earnings by the belief that the Government of the United States approved the project. A declaration by the Senate that the Government would insist that its consent is a necessary condition-precedent to the execution of any such scheme would be a warning to investors not to take any stock in an unauthorized enterprise. The honor of the country will thus be protected against accusations that its name led individuals, in this and other lands, to make investments which were to them total losses.

However we may be divided on political questions, and however we may wrangle on matters of domestic interest, the United States Senate has never failed, when a matter relating to foreign complications came before it involving the general welfare and peace of the country, to stand shoulder to shoulder, and to assert what the public interests demanded.

We therefore recommend the passage of the resolution already published in this report.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I desire to give notice that I shall call the resolution up to-morrow morning, with the report, and I ask the attention of the Senate for its consideration to-morrow.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will lie on the table subject to the call of the Senator from Rhode Island.

MINNESOTA STATE DEBT.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Mr. President, in a speech delivered in the Senate on the 11th of April last by the honorable Senator from Missouri who sits farthest from me, [Mr. VEST,] he referred to the State which I have the honor in connection with my colleague to represent here as having repudiated its pecuniary obligations. In order to protect our State against the charge of repudiation of any portion of its debts I stated to the Senate, with the permission of the Senator from Missouri, that that portion of our citizens who were opposed to the payment of the railroad bonds issued as a loan of the credit of the State to certain railroad companies based their opposition to the payment of these bonds upon the ground that the bonds were issued fraudulently and without consideration, and the indebtedness therefore was not a bona fide obligation; and when the Senator from Missouri proceeded further to state the facts in reference to the issuing of these bonds I stated to him that the bonds were issued by the executive of the State upon a mandamus issued by the supreme court of the State.

It might appear to one not familiar with all the circumstances that according to this statement those who are opposed to the payment of these bonds charged that the action of the supreme court and the action of the governor of the State was tainted with corruption or fraud. In justice to the judges of the supreme court of the State as then constituted, to the governor of the State and to myself, I desire to say that no charge of corruption, fraud, or wrong-doing in the mandamus proceedings or of the action of the governor in obedience to the writ is charged against the judges or the governor, and if my remarks will bear a construction unfavorable to these gentlemen I regret it. The charges of fraud refer to other steps in the proceedings resulting in issuing these bonds, which I will not now discuss. These gentlemen are eminent and honored citizens of our State; with all of them my relations are cordial and pleasant, and some of them are my personal friends.

Mr. President, I desire further to say that while there is a deep-seated and strong conviction in the minds of many of our citizens that there is no obligation upon the State to pay any portion of these bonds, yet there is not one person, so far as I know, who is not willing and ready to pay to every holder of any of these bonds the full amount paid by him for such bonds as he holds. The refusal to pay the entire amount of the bonds must not be construed into an indifference to the maintenance of the public faith or a want of moral or political integrity. Whether right or wrong those opposed to the payment of these bonds believe that in resisting their payment they are performing a duty. Under such circumstances, whatever you may say of them you cannot call them repudiationists. Remove or overcome this conviction, and in my opinion those who are now opposed to the payment of these bonds will be prompt to insist upon their liquidation. Every other pecuniary obligation incurred before or after these railroad bonds were issued the State has or will promptly meet and discharge. Her bonds, whenever offered, command a premium in the New York market, and since the speech of the Senator from Missouri was delivered 5 per cent. of the municipal bonds of her capital city, in which I have the honor to reside, being offered, were eagerly competed for and commanded a premium of 3 per cent.

Therefore, notwithstanding the existence of this unfortunate railroad bond indebtedness, which I trust will soon be satisfactorily removed, I can assert in this honorable presence, and before the nation, that no State in this Union has a higher appreciation of moral and political integrity than Minnesota, the State of my home.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. DAWES. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. COCKRELL. I supposed the Senator would want to proceed to the consideration of the resolution for the election of officers of the Senate.

Mr. DAWES. I had no idea the Senator would feel like acting on that resolution; it is not in accordance with the disposition which he has manifested since the beginning. I insist upon my motion.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. The Senator told us some time ago that the Government would be subverted if we did not pass that resolution.

Mr. DAWES. But the Senator would never be convinced until he happened to have an accidental majority.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is not debatable.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. We will not insist on a vote on the resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair calls the Senator from Georgia to order.

Mr. DAWES. An accident is an eye-opener to my friend from Georgia.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. We will be liberal.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After one hour and nine minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at one o'clock and thirty-three minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

TUESDAY, May 17, 1881.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I desire to ask the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] who I see is present, whether he is ready to proceed with his resolution for the election of officers of the Senate.

Mr. DAWES. I say in all frankness to the Senator from West Virginia that whatever the majority of the Senate, the Senate itself, shall decide in regard to that resolution, I shall bow to; and I shall not be found resisting the Senate itself. If the Senator from West Virginia has become, from any accidental occurrences on this side, ready to submit to the will of the majority because he thinks the majority is on his side, I have not a word to say, but shall bow to the will of the majority, whether it be for me or whether it be against me. The Senator from West Virginia is at liberty to make any motion in respect to the resolution which he pleases.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I am glad the Senator has expressed a willingness to proceed, and I hope he will do as he usually has done, make a motion to at once proceed to the business he has been so anxious to dispose of for such a long time.

Mr. DAWES. If the Senator is through——

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I claim the floor, but I give way to my friend.

Mr. DAWES. I regret exceedingly that the Senator from West Virginia is ambitious to expose the ground upon which he stands. One would suppose that when a Senator of the United States took a position so radically inconsistent with the fundamental principles of the Government, that the majority shall not rule unless the majority will do as he wants, he would not be ambitious to uncover himself to the American people. I would suggest to the Senator that the Scriptures speak of men in not a commendable light who make bare themselves to the gaze of an indignant public, exposing themselves and their shame.

Now I have to say to the Senator that if he has no higher ground for the opposition which he has made to the resolution and to the Senate itself than simply because he was conscious that the result up to yesterday would be against him, and that he now wakes up to an alarming and new zeal for the passage of that resolution simply and solely because an accidental majority yesterday morning was turned upon him, I submit to him that all the glory of such a position as that, so far as I am concerned, shall be his; and now any motion he desires to make in reference to that resolution will not find me interposing anything but the force of my own vote.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I regret very much that my friend has to refer to the Scriptures to support him. I think that reference does not come from the right direction. I also regret very much that he has in support of his case to call in question something that will attract attention to himself. It appears to me that he had better drop that part of his argument. As he said to me once, that is a little stale. I would not use that word, but he has used it, I believe, heretofore.

As to calling attention to the resolution and this "accidental majority," I should like to know from the Senator how long he is going to have "an accidental majority." He has had it two or three times already. Two or three times has he appealed to the Senate and talked about a "constitutional majority," saying that we were obstructing business, and that we ought to bow to that majority which he bowed to at all times. More in a pleasant way than otherwise, I asked him whether he wished to proceed to the consideration of the resolution. I certainly did not wish to force it, and without my calling the attention of my amiable friend from Massachusetts to it he would not have had the opportunity of making the speech he has made. I know he feels relieved, as it has been several days since he has had an opportunity of making such a speech. I want him to let down a little so that he can get down easy, and so that we may get through with the business for which we were called here and adjourn at the proper time.

The Senator has been so much in the habit directly after the reading of the Journal of calling up his resolution that I thought it was not out of place to remind him of it. I myself had no wish to force it upon him, nor do I desire now to force it upon him; but I hope he will get done with this "accidental and constitutional majority" for a while and let us proceed to business as we should do, and not continue here debating the question so long.

Mr. DAWES. Now the Senator having had his opportunity, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I hope the Senator from Massachusetts will withdraw that motion. I gave notice yesterday that I should this morning ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the resolution reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations touching interoceanic ship-canals. Will the Senator withdraw his motion for that purpose?

Mr. DAWES. I should like to accommodate the Senator from Rhode Island, but really I am so anxious to proceed with the public business, that for which we were called together here, that I must insist on the motion.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I will make no further request of the Senator from Massachusetts this morning, but I do sincerely hope that to-morrow morning the Senate will take up the resolution and pass upon it one way or the other.

Mr. DAWES. If the Senator will wait until to-morrow morning——

Mr. BURNSIDE. I will wait until to-morrow morning.

Mr. DAWES. I renew my motion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After three hours and thirty-five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

GENEVA TREATY AS TO WOUNDED IN WAR.

Mr. CONGER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be requested to furnish to the Senate copies (translations) of articles of convention signed at Geneva, Switzerland, August 22, 1864, touching the treatment of those wounded in war, together with the forms of ratification employed by the several governments, parties thereto.

NOTIFICATION TO THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. BAYARD submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That a committee consisting of two Senators be appointed by the Chair to wait upon the President and inquire if he has any other business to lay before the Senate.

THE GENERAL LAND OFFICE.

Mr. MORGAN submitted the following resolution for consideration; which was ordered to be printed:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands is instructed to take into consideration the condition of the General Land Office with respect to the classification of the officers and employés thereof; the convenient arrangement and security of the files and records of said office; and the provision of additional room for the transaction of the business thereof.

2. That said committee have leave to sit during the recess of the Senate, to employ a stenographer, and to send for persons and papers.

CENTRAL PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. SAUNDERS submitted the following resolution for consideration; which was ordered to be printed:

Whereas the Auditor of Railroad Accounts, in a letter dated February 14, 1881, and transmitted by the Secretary of the Interior to Congress February 15, 1881, sets forth "that while the amount of the 5 per cent. earnings of the Union Pacific Railroad has steadily increased since 1874, that of the Central Pacific has nearly as steadily decreased;" and

Whereas in this same connection it is also set forth that this is owing partly to the fact that the Central Pacific has diverted "business from the subsidized roads to the leased lines, which leased lines are principally owned by the owners of the Central Pacific, who are paid high rentals therefor;" and

Whereas the Commissioner of Railroad Accounts recommends, and the Secretary of the Interior concurs in his recommendation, to wit, "That the sinking-fund law of May 7, 1878, be changed so far as relates to the amount required from the Central Pacific, so that 50 per cent. of the net earnings of that company may be applied to the payment of the debt, instead of 25 per cent., as the law now is:" Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary of the Senate be directed to inquire into all these matters, and particularly touching the relations of the Central Pacific Railroad to its leased lines and other corporations, and especially those lines and corporations in which its stockholders are interested, and report to the Senate, at the next regular session, what in their judgment is proper and necessary to most effectually protect the interest of the United States.

OSAGE RIVER SURVEY.

Mr. COCKRELL submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to transmit to the Senate the report of Captain O. H. Ernst, on the survey of the Osage River, made in March, 1881, with any accompanying papers, &c.

On motion of Mr. DAWES, (at three o'clock and fifty-four minutes p. m.,) the Senate adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, May 18, 1881.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. BURNSIDE, it was Ordered, That General Ward B. Burnett have leave to withdraw the papers relating to his claim from the files of the Senate.

On motion of Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, it was Ordered, That William C. Dodge have leave to withdraw his papers, relating to a cartridge filler, from the files of the Senate.

On motion of Mr. JOHNSTON, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of Townsend Glover be withdrawn from the files of the Senate.

On motion of Mr. FRYE, it was Ordered, That Messrs. Pitcher and Hayford have leave to withdraw from the files of the Senate the papers in the case of Pitcher and Hayford and Otis and Ferguson, of Maine, under the rules of the Senate.

ADDITIONAL PAY TO EMPLOYÉS.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, this called session has been continued so long and has imposed such extra and unexpected duties and services upon all the officials connected with the Senate and the clerks that it seems to me very proper that the Senate should adopt some such resolution as I now offer. I ask that the following resolution be adopted:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be directed to pay, out of the contingent fund of the Senate, to the officers and employés of the Senate borne upon the annual rolls, a sum equal to one month's additional pay of their present annual salary; also one month's additional pay to the per diem committee clerks and pages.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think that ought to go to a committee. It is very ungracious to object to such a resolution, but yet there is no more vicious legislation in the world than just such legislation. I think the resolution ought to be referred at least to a committee of this body to examine it and decide whether it ought to be adopted.

Mr. DAWES. To what committee? The Committee on Contingent Expenses?

Mr. SHERMAN. The Committee on Contingent Expenses. I move that the resolution be referred to that committee.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio, to refer the resolution to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

DEPARTMENT EMPLOYÉS.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Committee on Printing, to which was referred a resolution enlarging the scope of the Official Register, have instructed me to report back the same and ask to be discharged from its further consideration. The committee, I may state, approve the object of the resolution; but the Official Register is published under a statute which prescribes particularly what shall be put into it, and it would not be in the power of the Senate to vary the law without the concurrence of the other House. Whether the compiler of the Register might add that, or not, is a subject upon which I express no opinion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will report the resolution.

The Chief Clerk read the following resolution, submitted by Mr. MCDILL on the 11th instant:

Resolved, That the Official Register of the United States shall hereafter include, in addition to the statistics required by section 510 of the Revised Statutes, information as to the congressional district from which each officer, clerk, employé, &c., in the service of the United States is appointed, and the original date of such appointment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Committee on Printing ask to be discharged from the further consideration of this resolution. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

ISTHMUS SHIP-CANAL.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I call up the resolution which I reported on Monday last from the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ask for its present consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Rhode Island asks for the present consideration of the resolution heretofore reported by him. The resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following resolution, reported by Mr. BURNSIDE from the Committee on Foreign Relations on the 16th instant:

Resolved, That the interests of the people of the United States of America and the welfare and security of their Government are so involved in the subject of the construction of ship-canals and other ways for the transportation of sea-going vessels across the isthmus connecting North and South America that the Government of the United States, with the frankness which is due to all other peoples and governments, hereby asserts that it will insist that its consent is a necessary condition precedent to the execution of any such project; and also as to the rules and regulations under which other nations shall participate in the use of such canals or other ways, either in peace or in war.

Mr. BURNSIDE. This resolution and kindred ones have been before the Senate two or three times, and I do not desire to detain the Senate with any further remarks on the subject-matter. I ask that the report in the case be read, and will then leave the Senate to decide what action shall be taken upon the resolution.

Mr. INGALLS. Will the Senator from Rhode Island inform the Senate if he desires to have action upon the resolution this morning?

Mr. BURNSIDE. I should be very glad to have action on it or to hear what Senators have to say on the subject. It is at the disposal of the Senate, of course.

Mr. INGALLS. I have no objection to the reading of the report that the Senator from Rhode Island has called for, but I am very clear that it is not wise or expedient that the Senate at this period of its sitting should pass a resolution upon the subject that is referred to, especially in the terms that are there employed.

Mr. BURNSIDE. This resolution, or a resolution very much like it, has been before the Senate for some time. I have called the attention of the Senate two or three times to the subject myself and have my own views upon it, and I think we are as ready to act upon it now as we ever shall be; but it is quite within the power of the Senate to decide whether they will act upon it or not. I shall be content with whatever action is taken under the circumstances.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the resolution reported by the Senator from Rhode Island from the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. SHERMAN. There is probably no graver subject connected with American politics than what is called the Monroe doctrine and the various propositions growing out of it. They have been discussed over and over again. It is assumed as a general proposition that we have great interests in everything that affects the South American republics and all the countries on this continent. That is true; but the language of the resolution is so broad, the subject is so important, that I did not suppose the Committee on Foreign Relations would care to press a vote upon the question at this session. They may be well informed on this subject, but I am not, and many other Senators who probably have heard it often discussed are not, prepared to vote affirmatively upon a proposition of this kind, nor do I see any occasion for it now.

The position of the United States has been taken time out of mind since it was first announced by President Monroe, and I do not think the Senate now, just at the heel of a called session, ought to pass upon this subject pro or con. The question will keep. I trust, therefore, that the resolution will be postponed until the next session. I will make that motion if no one else will do it.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Let it be postponed until the first Monday in December next.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will move to postpone the resolution until the first Monday in December next.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. From the outset I have been of the opinion that under no circumstances ought we at a session like this to engage in any business purely legislative. This was my opinion years ago, it is my opinion now, that the Senate cannot act upon a question of this kind with any degree of propriety. In the first place, the Constitution has delegated the legislative power of this country to the two houses of Congress. It says all legislative powers shall be vested in a Senate and a House of Representatives—the whole of them, not any part of them—and the same Constitution prevents either House from adjourning for a longer period than three days and acting separately from the other. What does this mean? It means that this great legislative trust shall be exercised by the two bodies, and not by one.

I ask if this is not the exercise of legislative power in the broadest sense? What can be more important than the expression of opinion embraced in the resolution upon a question affecting the interest of the American people? It may be the question of peace or war, because this brings us right in the face of foreign interests. Ought action to be taken upon a resolution of that description without the concurrence of the Representatives of the people of the United States at the other end of the Capitol? for Congress alone has power to declare war, and Congress is composed of two Houses. No step of this kind, in my judgment, ought to be taken by any leading committee of this body, or by the body itself, in the absence of the Representatives of the people at the other end of the Capitol.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Since the speech of the Senator from Indiana on the opposite side of the Chamber [Mr. VOORHEES] as to the propriety of the Senate acting upon questions that may come before it, I have felt that there was no impropriety whatever in acting upon this resolution. I have felt perfectly convinced that a resolution of this kind can with propriety be presented during an extra session of the Senate. I have been for nearly two years trying to get consideration of this subject. I think it is due to the people who are subscribing their money to enterprises connected with works on the Isthmus. If we remain silent upon this subject it is a tacit agreement that they are safe, as far as the Government of the United States is concerned, in making investments. I think it is due to them, it is due to our own country, that a declaration of this kind should be made. I also believe, as I said before, that it is quite proper to make such a declaration during a special session of the Senate. I have no disposition to force this matter upon the Senate. It is only because it is in the direction of good faith that I am trying to secure action.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. BURNSIDE. Certainly.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Let me ask, what will be the effect of a declaration such as is contained in the resolution if the Representatives of the people at the other end of the Capitol should dissent from it?

Mr. BURNSIDE. I was just coming to that point. This is not legislative action in the true sense of the word; it is simply a declaration of opinion by the Senate of the United States. Such things have been done before, and there is no reason why we should not express our opinion now. As I said before, I certainly have no disposition to occupy the time of the Senate or to press this matter upon the Senate if they do not desire to entertain it; and I shall make no captious opposition to the motion of the Senator from Ohio, who has moved to postpone the resolution until the first Monday in December. If that is the sense of the Senate, I shall yield to it with some reluctance but with quite good nature.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] to postpone the resolution until the first Monday in December next.

The motion was agreed to.

CENTRAL PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I ask the Senate to take up the resolution that I presented yesterday on the subject of railroad accounts, which is printed and on our tables.

The Chief Clerk read the following resolution, submitted by Mr. SAUNDERS May 17, 1881:

Whereas the Auditor of Railroad Accounts, in a letter dated February 14, 1881, and transmitted by the Secretary of the Interior to Congress February 15, 1881, sets forth, "that while the amount of the 5 per cent. earnings of the Union Pacific Railroad has steadily increased since 1874, that of the Central Pacific has nearly as steadily decreased;" and

Whereas, in this same connection, it is also set forth that this is owing partly to the fact that the Central Pacific has diverted "business from the subsidized roads to the leased lines, which leased lines are principally owned by the owners of the Central Pacific, who are paid high rentals therefor;" and

Whereas the Commissioner of Railroad Accounts recommends, and the Secretary of the Interior concurs in his recommendation, to wit, "That the sinking-fund law of May 7, 1878, be changed so far as relates to the amount required from the Central Pacific, so that 50 per cent. of the net earnings of that company may be applied to the payment of the debt, instead of 25 per cent., as the law now is:" Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary of the Senate be directed to inquire into all these matters, and particularly touching the relations of the Central Pacific Railroad to its leased lines and other corporations, and especially those lines and corporations in which its stockholders are interested, and report to the Senate, at the next regular session, what in their judgment is proper and necessary to most effectually protect the interests of the United States.

Mr. SAUNDERS. As the resolution sets forth, near the close of the last session of Congress a correspondence was had between the Auditor of Railroad Accounts and the Secretary of the Interior, but it came in too late for any action to be taken during that session. Since that time the Committee on Railroads have been frequently asked to have some action taken upon the subject. On consultation with that committee, and especially with the chairman, it was decided that the matter properly belonged to the law committee, the Committee on the Judiciary, to decide this question, and therefore we have asked in the resolution that that committee take charge of the matter and report at the next session of Congress. If there be occasion to satisfy the mind of any Senator that there is a necessity for this investigation, the communications which passed between the Secretary of the Interior and the Auditor of Railroad Accounts can be read, but I shall not read them unless the reading be called for.

Mr. INGALLS. I am not prepared either to affirm or deny that the inquiry proposed by this resolution should be made; but there are certain practical objections in the way of the method which the Senator from Nebraska proposes to adopt to which I would invite his attention and the attention of the Senate. The Committee on the Judiciary have already been charged by order of the Senate with the examination of the subject of bankruptcy during the recess of Congress. A subcommittee has been appointed to take charge of the inquiries rendered necessary by that resolution, and they will have all the labor that they can possibly perform until Congress meets in December. The chairman of the committee, the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] is in ill health, and will be able to do nothing during the recess. The Senator from New York, who stands next upon the list, (Mr. Conkling,) as some Senators probably are aware, is now temporarily absent from the Senate, and will perhaps not return here before next December. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. DAVIS] has also declared that he is unable to incur any extra labors during the vacation of the Senate.

If the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. SAUNDERS] proposes to commit this very important and laborious subject to the Committee on the Judiciary with the expectation that the vast amount of inquiry that is implied can be performed before next December, I must submit to him that he is laboring under what I conceive to be a very great mistake. I am not authorized to speak for the Committee on the Judiciary as its organ, but as one member of it I am quite confident that this subject should not be referred to that committee. I can see no reason myself why the Committee on Railroads which has charge of this and cognate subjects should not make the inquiry if it is necessary in the opinion of the Senator from Nebraska.

I hope, therefore, that the resolution will be modified to the extent at least of relieving the Committee on the Judiciary from the inquiry, leaving at this time the question of the propriety of the inquiry being made to the further consideration of the Senate.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I should be very glad, indeed, to relieve the Judiciary Committee or any other committee that is over-burdened with work. I am aware that the Judiciary Committee at times does have more business than it can well attend to; but there is no more appropriate committee, and no more appropriate subject can go before the committee than this one. It is evidently a question of law.

Mr. INGALLS. Will the Senator allow me one moment? There is a question of fact that will require the examination of witnesses and the sitting of the committee to take testimony, with the appointment of stenographers and clerks, before the question of law can be reached.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I am aware of all that. I would say further that I for one would be willing that the committee should sit during the recess and have a clerk and employ such aid as may be necessary to facilitate the work. It is an important work. If there were no importance attached to it, then we ought to pass it by as something that is idle and without any advantage to the Government or the country; but there is a large amount of money connected with this matter that it is asserted has not been paid over to the Government. If that be true, we ought to find it out; it is the duty of somebody to do it, and there is no more appropriate committee to do it than the Committee on the Judiciary. It could have no more important business before it this season than that, in my opinion. I ask the Secretary to read the communications between the Secretary of the Interior and the Auditor of Railroad Accounts, which will show the basis for this inquiry.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, February 15, 1881.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith copy of letter addressed to me yesterday by the Auditor of Railroad Accounts, setting forth certain facts and figures which, in his judgment, require an amendment of the sinking-fund act of May 7, 1878, so far as it relates to the Central Pacific Railroad Company. I concur in the views set forth in his letter, and commend them to the favorable consideration of Congress.

Very respectfully,

C. SCHURZ, Secretary.

The SPEAKER of the House of Representatives.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
OFFICE OF AUDITOR OF RAILROAD ACCOUNTS,
Washington, D. C., February 14, 1881.

SIR: I have the honor to submit for your consideration the following statements of facts relating to the operation of the Pacific Railroad sinking-fund law of May 7, 1878, and the condition of the debt of the Union and Central Pacific Companies on account of subsidy bonds and the interest accrued thereon:

For the ten calendar years 1870 to 1879, inclusive, the gross earnings, operating expenses, including taxes, general expenses, and rentals, and net earnings resulting, have been as follows:

Items.	Union Pacific.	Central Pacific.
Average miles operated	1,038	1,486
Gross earnings	$108,541,793	$138,754,303
Operating expenses	49,283,890	79,682,681
Net earnings	59,257,903	59,071,622

The net earnings for the same period, applicable to the payment of Government requirements under the decisions of the Supreme Court and under the act of Congress approved May 7, 1878, known as the sinking-fund law, have been less, as follows:

Union Pacific	$52,883,201 40
Central Pacific	43,172,023 20

The following table shows the amount of the "5 per cent. of net earnings" of the two companies by years:

Year ending, &c.	Union Pacific.	Central Pacific.
November 5, 1870	.....	$124,477 54
November 5, 1871	$189,942 09	138,001 83
November 5, 1872	163,000 32	194,367 43
November 5, 1873	259,219 49	208,195 87
November 5, 1874	272,091 29	297,320 70
November 5, 1875	324,084 15	277,115 37
November 5, 1876	367,666 23	280,194 80
November 5, 1877	372,041 50	212,474 70
Seven months and 25 days ending June 30, 1878	202,748 14	138,981 76
Six months ending December 31, 1878	186,883 64	107,238 38
Year ending December 31, 1879	306,583 22	179,912 78
Total	2,644,160 07	2,158,601 16
1880, estimated	350,000 00	220,000 00
1881, estimated	400,000 00	200,000 00
Total	3,394,160 07	2,578,601 16

From the above table it will be seen that while the amount of the "5 per cent. of net earnings" of the Union Pacific has steadily increased since 1874, that of the Central Pacific has nearly as steadily decreased. This is owing partly to the fact that the average number of miles of road operated by the Central Pacific has been increased from year to year, while that of the Union Pacific has not been increased, but more particularly by diversion of business from the subsidized road to leased lines, which leased lines are principally owned by the owners of the Central Pacific, who are paid high rentals therefor, and by a consequent reduction of the percentage of subsidized miles of road to the mileage of all roads operated, upon which percentage a pro rata division of local business has chiefly to be based.

The miles of road operated by the Central Pacific since 1870 have been as follows:

Year ending November 5, 1870	969
Year ending November 5, 1871	1,050
Year ending November 5, 1872	1,148
Year ending November 5, 1873	1,254
Year ending November 5, 1874	1,261
Year ending November 5, 1875	1,297
Year ending November 5, 1876	1,372
Year ending November 5, 1877	1,842
Seven months and twenty-five days ending June 30, 1878	2,090
Six months ending December 31, 1878	2,160
Year ending December 31, 1879	2,319
Year ending December 31, 1880 (estimated)	2,491
Year ending December 31, 1881 (estimated)	2,750
Average about	1,656
Subsidized line is	860.66

The Union Pacific Railroad is 1,038 miles, all subsidized.

Under the methods and practice of the Central Pacific Company the greater the number of miles of railroad it leases and operates the less becomes the proportion of net earnings for the subsidized line.

The condition of the debt of these companies to the United States may be stated as follows:

Items.	Union Pacific.	Central Pacific.
Principal	$27,236,512	$27,855,680
Interest to December 31, 1879	19,238,182	19,271,111
Total	46,474,694	47,126,791
Repaid by transportation and cash	9,826,638	4,541,318
Balance December 31, 1879	36,642,056	42,585,473
Add two years' interest, 1880 and 1881	3,268,381	3,342,682
	39,916,437	45,928,155
Less estimated payments under "Thurman" law—two years 1880 and 1881	3,750,000	2,100,000
Balance December 31, 1881	36,166,437	43,828,155

By this it appears that while the Union Pacific has reached that condition in regard to its payments to the United States where the amount of 25 per cent. of its net earnings annually exceeds the amount of the annual interest payment now made by the United States, the Central Pacific, on the other hand, not only has not reached that condition, but will, in its present practice relating to leased lines is continued, correspondingly decrease its net earnings liable to the 25 per cent. under the law to such an extent that its payments hereafter will probably not more than equal one-half of those of the Union Pacific.

As to the other debts of these companies, the Central Pacific, to December 31, 1879, had reduced its debt and had on hand funds applicable to such reduction, in all amounting to $6,592,218; while the Union Pacific, to the same date, had paid and held applicable to the payment of its debt the sum of $27,770,387; both of which results are shown below.

Funded debt, December 31, 1879.

Items.	Union Pacific.	Central Pacific.
Total bonds issued	$65,540,000	$59,750,000
Outstanding December 31, 1879	50,973,000	57,030,000
Redeemed	14,567,000	2,720,000
Sinking fund December 31, 1879	613	4,068,662
Land notes on hand, 1879	3,976,520	1,763,525
Total redemption, &c	18,544,133	8,552,187

Floating debt, December 31, 1879.

Items.	Union Pacific.	Central Pacific.
Bills payable	$705,684	$4,212,960
Accounts payable	2,567,265	1,769,596
Dividends payable	555,940	1,630,729
Total	3,828,889	7,613,285
Less:
Bills receivable	59,500	1,021,363
Materials on hand	1,086,689	2,226,428
Cash	490,708	540,966
Bonds and stocks	7,428,228	983,324
Accounts receivable	3,990,018	881,235
Total	13,055,143	5,653,316
Net floating debt		1,959,969
Net surplus	9,226,254
Net "total redemptions" and "surplus over floating debt," &c.	27,770,387	6,592,218

In view of the foregoing statements of facts, and of the additional fact that of the payments of $1,200,000 in money by the Central Pacific Company annually under the sinking-fund law (as anticipated by its framers) but $774,428.92 for the two and one-half years ending December 31, 1880, instead of $3,000,000, will be required, it is recommended that the sinking-fund law of May 7, 1878, be changed so far as relates to the amount required from the Central Pacific, so that 50 per cent. of the net earnings of that company may be applied to the payment of the debt, instead of 25 per cent., as the law now is.

Very respectfully,

THEO'S FRENCH, Auditor.

Hon. C. SCHURZ, Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. SAUNDERS. That is the whole correspondence between the parties, and it shows the importance of the question before the Senate. If the Committee on the Judiciary think they cannot attend to this without having authority to sit during the vacation, I am perfectly willing to move that they shall do so. I think that is the committee which ought to take charge of the subject, for in my opinion it properly belongs to them.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. There is not any necessity for a committee of this body to investigate this subject at all. The Auditor of Railroad Accounts has authority to do all upon this subject that is necessary.

Mr. BAYARD. And he was appointed for that very purpose.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. And he was appointed for that very purpose. When he has done so, and a legal question arises that ought to be considered by the Committee on the Judiciary, there will be no difficulty about that; but the ascertainment of the facts upon which the question arises ought to be done by the Auditor of Railroad Accounts. It was for that very purpose that that office was created. If I recollect aright—the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] will correct me if I am wrong—(my colleague [Mr. LOGAN] and the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] have recently come upon the committee,) the late chairman of the Judiciary Committee had several consultations with the Auditor of Railroad Acounts on this subject, and he thought there was no necessity for any action by the Senate at present, as the Auditor of Railroad Accounts would make further investigation and report to Congress upon the subject.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I will ask the Senator to whom he alludes?

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I allude to Judge Thurman. This was last February. We had the subject before us then. At any rate it was left to Judge Thurman, who was the author of the bill, to go and see, and he was in doubt whether anything had been done that required action then, but concluded that further investigation would be made by the Auditor of Railroad Accounts.

There is no use in charging any particular duty relating to this subject upon the Committee on the Judiciary. At this stage of the session all committees are more or less disorganized; the Judiciary Committee is very much so. If there is any legal question for them to pass upon at the next session of Congress, they can be asked to do it; but it is perfectly idle to impose this duty upon the committee now. The work would not be done. It would not be done by any committee unless they want to rove around the country, and the Judiciary Committee does not want to do any such thing as that; it does not want to go to San Francisco and elsewhere and try to investigate; there is not any necessity for it; it is an expense they wish to avoid. When they have got facts presented before them which the Auditor of Railroad Accounts can ascertain and make known to them at the next session of Congress, then any legal question can be settled.

Mr. LOGAN. I understand he has gone now for the purpose of ascertaining the facts.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. He told Judge Thurman that was the purpose. I do not know whether the stock market is to be affected one way or the other by this resolution, but I have a natural aversion to its coming in at this period of the session, and I move, therefore, to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President——

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I withdraw the motion, that the Senator from Delaware may be heard.

Mr. BAYARD. I have nothing to say except to confirm what was said by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] in regard to the occupation of the Committee on the Judiciary being full enough already. We have already a subcommittee appointed to consider the very important matter of the re-enactment of a general bankrupt law that may occupy the gentlemen who form that subcommittee very fully during the recess.

As to what the Senator from Illinois has said it scarcely needs restatement. This very class of information is wholly within the control of the Commissioner of Railroad Accounts. He was appointed by law for the purpose of furnishing to the Government the very information asked for in this case. The appointment of a subcommittee or of a special committee would, in my judgment, be entirely superfluous; and not only superfluous, but I think it would be rather detrimental to the object which is in view.

There is no mystery about the fact as to what the earnings of these roads are. There is no mystery about the fact as to what their sinking fund is or is not to be. The sole question is whether Congress has the power to control the amount of that sinking fund. That has been indicated by the passage of a law heretofore, and will be again, I trust, whenever it becomes necessary.

I shall vote for the motion of the Senator from Illinois to lay the resolution upon the table, because we have already ample machinery in the office of the Commissioner of Railroad Accounts to inform us upon all of these particulars. If it should be wanted let the ordinary order or resolution be passed directing him to return to the Senate at the next session the information asked for in this resolution and we shall get it.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. That is the very purpose I have in view.

Mr. LOGAN. I was seeking the floor to make the suggestion which was last made by the Senator from Delaware. I agree with what has been said by the Senator from Delaware and my colleague and the Senator from Kansas, that there is no necessity whatever for this resolution. It is perfectly understood in the law; and this Auditor is required to do, as has been well stated, exactly what the committee would be required to do under the resolution; and if a question of law arises it will be time enough then to refer it to the Judiciary Committee, or some other committee, to decide that question. No such question as that is now before the Senate, and I think in the present condition of the committee it would be imposing a burden on them that they cannot possibly perform during the vacation. I am sure of that; and especially they ought not to be required to perform it when there is a person specially charged to perform the duty; and when he has performed it and brought all the facts before Congress, it will be time for Congress to decide on those facts. I agree to the motion of my colleague to lay this on the table.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I renew the motion to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I hope the Senator will allow it to go over and not lay it on the table.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. No, I want this session to end and I want when a thing is plainly discussed here for the Senate to decide whether it shall be laid on the table or not.

Mr. SAUNDERS. The motion to lay on the table does not give us an opportunity to be heard.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. The Senate will say what shall be done.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Illinois moves to lay the pending resolution on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

DEPARTMENT EMPLOYÉS.

Mr. KELLOGG submitted the following resolution; which was read:

Resolved, That the Secretaries of State, Treasury, Interior, War, Navy, and the Postmaster-General be directed to transmit to the Senate the names of all officers, clerks, and other employés borne upon their rolls, respectively, not required to be confirmed by the Senate, and the salary paid to each, together with the date of their appointment, the State to which each is charged, the grade of office held, the compensation received, and whether each of said officers, clerks, or employés is white or colored.

Mr. BAYARD. Let that lie over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection being made, the resolution goes over.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Let it be printed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The order to print will be made.

Mr. KELLOGG. I desire to state, with the permission of the Senate, that after consulting with some Senators I offer that resolution in order to bring it before the Senate to-morrow morning, and in the mean time it gives the Committee on Printing an opportunity to consider it, because it leaves out of the original resolution I offered some days since all that matter which it was presumed would cause considerable expense to procure.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask the Senator from Louisiana what disposition was made of a similar resolution introduced by him some days ago?

Mr. KELLOGG. I have just stated that this is different, inasmuch as it leaves out one or two requirements contained in the other resolution, that I ascertained it was feared would cause considerable delay in time and considerable additional expense. It does not call for some information that I think is needed and that ought to be had, but it covers all necessary information except what will cause considerable expense and delay.

VISITOR TO NAVAL ACADEMY.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to state to the Senate that it will be impossible for me to discharge the duties imposed upon me by the Vice-President at the last session under the law, namely, being one of the visitors at the Naval Academy at Annapolis. I find my business arrangements are such that I cannot go; therefore I beg to be excused and ask that another Senator be appointed in my place.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If no objection be made the Senator is excused.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

A message in writing was received from the President of the United States by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his Secretaries.

Mr. DAWES. I move that the Senate do now proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After thirty-two minutes spent in executive session, the doors were reopened.

NOTIFICATION TO THE PRESIDENT.

On motion of Mr. BAYARD, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the following resolution submitted by him yesterday:

Resolved, That a committee consisting of two Senators be appointed by the Chair to wait upon the President and inquire if he has any other business to lay before the Senate.

The resolution was agreed to; and the Vice-President being authorized to appoint the committee, Mr. BAYARD, and Mr. CAMERON of Pennsylvania, were appointed.

RECESS.

On motion of Mr. INGALLS, the Senate took a recess for one hour.

On reassembling, at two o'clock and twenty minutes p. m.—

NOTIFICATION TO THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. BAYARD, from the committee appointed to wait upon the President and inquire if he has any other business to lay before the Senate, reported that they had performed the duty assigned them, and that the President had replied that he had other communications yet to make to the Senate.

ADDITIONAL PAY TO EMPLOYÉS.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to whom was referred the resolution this day submitted by Mr. DAWES to pay one month's extra pay to the employés of the Senate, reported it with an amendment.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

A message in writing was received from the President of the United States by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After twenty-five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at two o'clock and forty-seven minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

THURSDAY, May 19, 1881.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

DEPARTMENT EMPLOYÉS.

Mr. KELLOGG. I rise to call up the resolution I submitted yesterday, and ask that it be read. I should like a consideration of the resolution by the Senate this morning.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Louisiana calls up the resolution heretofore submitted by him, which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following resolution, submitted yesterday by Mr. KELLOGG:

Resolved, That the Secretaries of State, Treasury, Interior, War, Navy, and the Postmaster-General be directed to transmit to the Senate the names of all officers, clerks, and other employés borne upon their rolls, respectively, not required to be confirmed by the Senate, and the salary paid to each, together with the date of their appointment, the State to which each is charged, the grade of office held, the compensation received, and whether each of said officers, clerks, or employés is white or colored.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to know from the Senator from Louisiana why that information is desired when by the 1st of July, under a law passed by both Houses of Congress, a law which has been in existence for sixty-odd years, this information is required to be sent to the Interior Department to be compiled in the form of an Official Register? Why is it necessary now to call for the information, I should like to know?

Mr. KELLOGG. As I stated the other day, some of the information required by the resolution is not contained in the Blue Book; second, the Blue Book is printed in limited numbers, and its circulation is confined to heads of Departments, Senators, and Representatives; third, the Blue Book embraces, I think, some fifty or sixty thousand names, in two volumes, containing the names of all the employés of the United States Government, judicial, consular, diplomatic, and territorial; also all the customs officers, post-offices, and many others. The list of employés in the post-offices and custom-houses in the two cities of Philadelphia and New York would be nearly or quite as great in number as the names of all the employés and clerks asked for by the resolution.

No Senator or Representative desiring to ascertain what clerks are charged to his district or State can ascertain that fact without taking the Blue Book and going over very many pages and subjecting himself to much inconvenience and loss of time. It is limited in its circulation to the members of Congress and heads of Departments. No person with any degree of facility can point out the persons improperly charged to his State or district; information that should be open to every one; information which can be procured with facility and ease.

Having stated this, I now desire to ask what objection is there to having laid before the Senate, in the form of a Senate document containing a statement showing in condensed form the name of every person employed in the Departments in this District charged to each State, the grade of office that each holds, the compensation that each receives, and whether he is white or colored? I inquired at one of the Departments, and I was told that if that portion of the original resolution requiring information as to the persons upon whose recommendations the appointments were made was omitted, the remainder of the information called for in the resolution could be furnished without very great expense or delay. I do not know that we can now get it at this session, but we can have it upon our tables the first of next session.

If a document of that kind is placed upon the table of every Senator, a compiled, brief, succinct statement under the head of each State of every individual charged in the Departments, with the grade of office, the compensation, and, according to the amendment of the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. BROWN,] "whether white or colored," the Senator, Member of the House, or other person seeking this information can ascertain it easily and at once; for instance, if it be the fact that when the Senator from Georgia goes to a Department and inquires whether a vacancy that he knew occurred a month or a week ago has been filled, he is told that it has been filled, and so far as he can ascertain finds it was filled by some person put in by a favorite clerk or by the chief of a bureau in the Department, and finds the appointment charged to Georgia, although the appointee was from the District of Columbia, or from Connecticut, or Ohio, or New York, or some other State, I do not see why the Senate should not have data that will enable him to expose this injustice if, as I have said, it really exists. Waiving the question as to who recommends the appointment, what objection is there to letting it be known in such way that it will be easily accessible to any inquiry what persons are charged to the different States and whether they belong to those States or not?

Mr. PLUMB. I desire to ask the Senator from Louisiana a question.

Mr. KELLOGG. Certainly.

Mr. PLUMB. Does he regard it as offensive to the State of Louisiana, or would any Senator regard it as offensive to his State, to have a good officer charged to his State?

Mr. KELLOGG. I do not know that I do, except that the law of 1875, applicable to the Treasury Department, and other laws by implication applicable to the other Departments, provide that since the date of that act all appointments shall be filled from the different States or credited to each State according to the ratio of population.

Mr. PLUMB. Let me ask the Senator another question. Inasmuch as nearly all the appointments are already made from the District of Columbia and made in that way, what matter is it to the State?

Mr. KELLOGG. I am obliged to the Senator for asking me that question. I want it distinctly understood that it is not the intention, so far as I am concerned, and I do not think that it is the intention of other Senators, to push any good officer out. I offered this resolution because I had been urged to do it by some Senators and others. It is not the intention of myself or others, so far as I know, to push any efficient officer from his stool, to drive out any good clerk; but this Government is growing, the rolls of employés are increasing constantly, greater additions are needed each year, appropriations are increasing year by year, the patronage is constantly increasing, vacancies are occurring, and let us at least enforce the principle laid down by the act of 1875, that when appointments are made to fill vacancies and when the force in the Departments is increased, the patronage shall be given to the various States according to the ratio of population to people who belong to the States; so that if there are twenty vacancies between now and the first of August in the First Comptroller's office, for instance, or any other bureau of the Government, those twenty vacancies shall not be filled, when the Senators and Members and other representative people from the different States who are entitled to them are away, by the favorites of five, six, ten, or twelve of the principal officers, chiefs of bureaus, appointment clerks, and others in the different Departments of the Government here, but shall be filled according to law. Then when we meet in December the vacancies that are filled by removals or otherwise or the additions that are made to the constantly increasing force in the different Departments will appear in this printed document, with the date of appointment, and we can tell immediately when they were appointed, who the persons are, and whether they should be charged to such and such a State.

I cannot understand what objection there is to this being done. It cannot certainly cost very much to print this whole information; it cannot draw very heavily on the national purse. What is the objection to that information being laid before the Senate?

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, I regard the law which has been referred to, stuck in on an appropriation bill, as one of the greatest absurdities that disgrace the statutes of the United States. This scramble that is to be inaugurated to ascertain whether each State and each district has its due quota of clerks, so as to make the Senate the theater for the distribution of clerkships, I regard with utter abhorrence; and so far as I am concerned I will not vote for anything of the kind.

I know that the records are full of errors on this subject. There are many men who are charged to my State who do not belong there, but who belong to New York and various other places; and it is utterly impossible to tell how they got there. The only question that I think should be raised is whether the clerks are the best that can be obtained by the Departments. I regret to see that we are subjected daily to the interviews of various parties here while we are in session for places in some Department or other, and that the influence of Senators is sought. I think that is a kind of business which we ought not to engage in; and for one I do not propose to increase the obligation on the part of Senators to undertake any further distribution of clerkships.

I hope, therefore, that the resolution will not be passed; and if there is no one who desires to say anything on the subject, I will move to lay it on the table.

Mr. PLUMB. Mr. President——

Mr. BROWN. I hope the Senator from Vermont will withdraw his motion for a moment.

Mr. MORRILL. I will do so.

Mr. PLUMB. I do not care to make any remarks upon this subject. I am delighted, however, with the height to which the Senator from Vermont has arrived. He does not care whether Vermont has anything, and I think it is very probably for the reason that Vermont has already got more than it ought to have. I think I can perhaps discover in that the reason for the Senator's opposition to the resolution.

The offices of this Government belong to the people of the United States, the District of Columbia included, but the fact is that the District of Columbia has got about one-third of them, as I understand. If it is to be understood in the future as in the past that we are to have an office-holding class in the District of Columbia, the sooner we know it the better. I do not say that would not be wise; I only say that we ought to be relieved from any doubt as to what the policy of the Government is to be. If we are to have a class of people inducted into office by various devices at the back door or any other way, by purchase and sale, as is constantly going on in this city, and if because they happen to answer certain clerical requirements when they are put in they are never to be displaced, then of course we may, as we probably ought to, know whether we are under any responsibility to our constituents or anybody else in regard to the matter, and permit the bureau officer, or head of the Department, or whoever else may be charged with filling these places primarily, to have entire control without let or inquiry whatever.

I believe, however, that these offices ought to be divided, and I shall continue to believe so until some legislation fixing the other theory in the body of the statutes of this country is adopted. I believe that the information sought for ought to be had. It is just as much a part of our duty to know what becomes of the patronage as it is our duty to know that the business of the people who serve in these capacities is properly performed. I believe, also, that that business cannot be properly performed except upon a well-devised and properly-executed system of rotation. I do not believe that the men appointed twenty years ago are as good men as can be found to-day, even in the State of Vermont, although that is saying a good deal. I believe that the men of to-day, the new blood of this country, the men who represent new communities, new interests, and new ideas, are just as much entitled to be in the Departments as anybody else, and not only that, but their presence there would make the Departments better responsive to the business and interests of this country. I think something more than merely the qualification of writing a good hand and having sat in one seat fifteen or twenty years is necessary to carry on the business of this Government.

I believe in overhauling these things. I believe at all events in exposing to the people of the United States precisely the condition of the service with reference to the places where the employés come from. It is just as much a necessity concerning the political patronage of this country that the people should know about that, that they should be represented in the several Departments as that they should be represented in the Senate or on the floor of the House, and there can be no good purpose subserved by keeping this information away from the people. The people are not likely to be hurt by a surfeit of information. They know half the truth now, and it excites a great deal of anger which perhaps the whole truth would dispel. Let them know exactly how it is; let them know exactly where the responsibility for it rests; let all men and all parties be willing to meet their responsibilities upon the facts as they are found to be, and the whole matter will be settled.

Mr. KELLOGG. I would not say a word further, but for the fact that the other day the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] indulged in remarks similar to those that have fallen from his lips to-day in regard to this matter. I felt then that the honorable Senator left a wrong impression in regard to this resolution. I thought the Senator from Vermont, unintentionally no doubt, conveyed the impression that this matter was simply a hunt for office. I have before me the statute of 1871. Section 1754 provides that—

> Persons honorably discharged from the military or naval service by reason of disability resulting from wounds or sickness incurred in the line of duty shall be preferred for appointments to civil offices, provided they are found to possess the business capacity necessary for the proper discharge of the duties of such offices.

I ask the Senator from Vermont if a discharged soldier from his State were to put in an appearance here at the capital, recommended by leading citizens of his State, a man with scars that he bore because of wounds received in battle in defense of his country, does the honorable Senator think that that man, in case of a vacancy in a clerkship now charged to Vermont occurring next month, should be turned away while the chief of a bureau gives it to a favorite who is recommended by no resident of Vermont, some person who himself has no claim as a resident of Vermont, appointed without any other influence save that he happened to have a chief of bureau or appointment clerk at his back?

Mr. MORRILL. If the Senator will allow me to answer that, I had just such a recommendation presented to me this morning of a wounded soldier. Yesterday a lady came here whose husband's hands are both paralyzed. She has just been discharged from the Census Bureau; she has three children; and I had one or two other applications in the course of the day. All I desire to say is that I do not like to have it go abroad and become the settled practice that it is only necessary for applicants to apply to Senators. I do not wish to have my heart torn out of me every day on account of applications for clerkships.

Mr. KELLOGG. Did the Senator from Vermont, I ask respectfully, apply to that soldier and to that woman in necessitous circumstances, meritorious cases, he says, the same remark in substance that he applied to the Senate a short time since, that it was degrading and unworthy for Senators to apply for vacant positions, thus perhaps leaving those positions to be given to those not entitled to them under the law?

Mr. MORRILL. The Senator is very wrong in making that statement. I made no such statement; I merely said it was degrading to the Senate to become the mere distributor of clerkships.

Mr. KELLOGG. And I reply to the Senator from Vermont that, as I said the other day, (and he will find it in my published remarks in the RECORD,) it is not the intention of this resolution to push any one out of office or to disturb any meritorious clerk. The intention is that when vacancies occur and when additional appointments are made in the proper time and in compliance with law and the demands of justice, the vacancies shall be filled by persons best entitled under the law to receive these appointments, and that they shall be charged hereafter to each State according to the law of 1875, which provides specifically that each State shall be credited with its due quota according to the population thereof. That law I did not read, but I did read the one applying to wounded soldiers.

I felt the other day that the Senator was putting me in a false position, and I reply with some feeling, for which I hope the Senate will make due allowance. I repeat, we do not desire to interfere with persons in office who are properly in office who are good, efficient clerks. We are not hunting them out. We simply want the law complied with. We want to know whether it has been complied with. We want data furnished from each Department at no great cost placed upon our tables in the early future or when we meet in December, so that by an examination without much labor, without going through the Blue Book with sixty or seventy thousand names scattered through it, we can ascertain just where clerks and other employés are credited, their names and date of appointment, whether they are entitled to be credited to the State and whether they are proper beneficiaries of the Government; whether they should have been appointed to fill vacancies according to the requirements of the law of 1875 and the law of 1871.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, I confess I do not see why all this sensitiveness should exist in reference to giving the information that is asked for by the resolution. Resolutions calling for information from the different Departments are not infrequent here; they are of almost daily occurrence; we seldom hear any opposition; we seldom hear a discussion gotten up about such a resolution; it goes almost as a matter of course if it is a simple call for information.

There is a statute, as has been properly stated by the Senator from Louisiana, requiring in the Treasury Department that the clerks shall be appointed from the different States, Territories, and District of Columbia in proportion to the population of the respective States. I presume there is no Senator in the Chamber to-day who can tell whether that has been done in regard to his State or not. I have made efforts in reference to my own State, and I can tell nothing about it. The Blue Book gives us no information on that subject. It is true it gives the name of the individual, where born, and from what State appointed, but it does not give, as asked for in this resolution, the date of the appointment. I go to the Secretary of the Treasury and ask him if we have the proper quota from Georgia. He looks and tells me we have not. I ask him to fill it; if he will not give the appointments to democrats, to fill the quota with worthy republicans from Georgia. He tells me there are no vacancies. I tell him that there are in the Blue Book charged to Georgia names of individuals who probably never saw Georgia, who are not citizens of that State and never have been. In reply to this he informed me the other day that if I would give him information as to the names of these persons, and they had stated falsehoods as to residence to get their places, he would discharge them. I asked him, then, to be kind enough to give me the names of the persons now charged to my State. They were sent to me. I compared them with the Blue Book, and I found that part of the names standing on the Blue Book had been dropped, I understand dropped within the last few days, from the quota charged to Georgia, a confession of judgment at once.

Mr. HOAR. In what Department?

Mr. BROWN. In the Treasury Department. It was a confession of judgment that they were put there and charged to Georgia when the appointees were not citizens of Georgia. The Senator from Louisiana now calls for information (for I presume the same rule applies in his State and probably to every Southern State) as to the names of persons appointed and when appointed. We ask when appointed because the Secretary meets us with a statement that the law only applies to appointments made since the passage of the law, and unless we know when each was appointed we cannot tell whether it was an appointment in violation of law since the passage of the act. There is now no information in the Blue Book or anywhere else that enables us to tell whether an appointment has been made since or before the passage of that statute.

Now the Senator from Louisiana calls for that information. Why should we not have it? What impropriety is there in it? The honorable Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] says it will annoy Senators, and he seems to have a disgust for the whole matter. If my State had fared as well as most of the New England States have and some of the other States nearer the capital, I might feel something of the same disgust at anything looking to displace them. I think the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] very properly says that these offices belong to the people, and they should therefore belong to the people of the respective States; each State should be entitled to its quota. That is the object of the law. That is not carried out, I believe, in practice, and we want the information now called for so as to bring it properly before Congress and the country and have it carried out if the heads of Departments will not do it. That is what we mean.

Mr. MORRILL. Will the Senator from Georgia allow me a single moment?

Mr. BROWN. With a great deal of pleasure.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to say that during the war, "the late unpleasantness," it is true that the New England and other Northern States obtained a large number of appointments to fill vacancies in the different Departments; but I can say to the Senator from Georgia that since the war was over and the South has been reconstructed the North, so far as I know anything about it, has not received any undue favor at all.

Mr. BROWN. My reply to the honorable Senator from Vermont is that the appointments which the Northern and Western States got during the war they were entitled to, and I do not seek to disturb them. That was right. But my charge is that there has not been a fair distribution made since the war. That is the very point; and I want the information so that the Senator from each State can determine for himself, when he looks over it, whether his State has had the distribution that she is entitled to. I do not seek to disturb anybody who was appointed during the war, and I will not vote to disturb anybody who was appointed during the war, but I do seek to have the law fairly executed, and have my State at least get her fair share since the war. I think that is just and proper. I see no reason why anybody should oppose it.

It may be said that as a democratic Senator I have no right to interfere with this matter. It is true the democrats expect very little from a republican administration. I am not making that the subject of complaint. I should be very glad, it is true, to see a little more liberality in the distribution of the offices; and if the civil-service reform means anything, it ought not to mean that all the officers should be appointed from one political party. But I lay that all out of the question now. You claim that "to the victors belong the spoils." Then take the offices for your own party. But as I have stated before on this floor, my colleague and I are the only representatives in this Chamber of the republicans of Georgia, and if the democrats cannot get any share, I claim for the republicans of Georgia a fair and just share in the distribution. That is the reason why I interest myself in this matter.

In addition to that point I have already stated that I think the colored people have a very meager share in the distribution of the offices in the Departments in Washington, and I see no reason why the information should not be given in each case whether the officer is white or colored. Nobody should be afraid to know it. There is no reason why the country might not know it. It is no official secret; it is no party secret; it is a thing that every American citizen has a right to know. Why this opposition? Why may we not know the name of each employé, the State from which he or she is appointed, the date of the appointment, and whether each is white or colored?

As stated by the Senator from Louisiana, we do not seek to interfere with the Blue Book at all. We want this simple information from the different Departments in Washington to know how the distribution has been made here. I think we ought to insist upon it, and continue to insist on it until it is given. And I confess I think it is very astonishing that republican Senators should be unwilling to permit the country to have the information.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I certainly do not object to furnishing the Senate any information upon this subject that is proper and right; I do not object to this information being furnished, but I say that now under the law the Secretary of the Interior is preparing the Official Register, which contains all the information called for here, and other information in regard to other officers of the Government not covered by this resolution.

Mr. BROWN. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senator will let me finish my statement for once I should like to do it. I hope this practice of interrupting will be broken up some time.

There is no law on the statute-book requiring a distribution of officers among the several States, except as to the Treasury Department. That law was passed in 1875. That law is not as stated by the Senator from Georgia; but it simply requires that after a certain date subsequent to the passage of the law all appointments shall be made from the States having less than their proportion. At that time the District of Columbia had about five hundred appointments or perhaps about one-fourth of all the appointments allowed to the entire country. The reason was because most of those employés came to Washington and entered their residence as in the District of Columbia. Many of them did not reside in the District of Columbia except because they lived here to perform their official duties. That law has been observed for five years and faithfully carried out and the disproportion between the several States has gradually changed. The New England States, New York, Pennsylvania, and the older States got no appointments for several years; I have denied over and over again appointments to those States; and the difficulty was gradually rectifying itself so that there was no practical trouble in the Treasury Department, no discrimination against a State. The Southern States and the Western States were gradually getting their proportion of appointments.

But it was claimed by some that the law was intended to make a new partition, to require the discharge of the employés from States in excess of their proportion. That matter was submitted to the Attorney-General, and the Attorney-General held, and I think every lawyer who reads the statute would say, that the law does not require that, but simply relates to future appointments. Under the process that was going on in the Treasury Department the offices were gradually becoming distributed. Sometimes Senators would come in and say, "Well, such a person does not belong to the State of Georgia." Upon inquiry in nine cases out of ten it would be found that he did belong to the State of Georgia, but the Senator did not happen to know him, or he had lived in Georgia and acquired a residence there. In some cases, probably, wrong information was given to the Department, and wherever that occurred it was corrected.

Now, Mr. President, my objection to this resolution is that under the present law the very information desired here will be furnished to us at the next session of Congress. Then, if Congress desires or either House of Congress desires to get in a separate form a portion of this information or to have it put forth in a different way, it can be done without any trouble; but now to require these various Departments to go to work and make new lists is simply duplicating labor; and instead of costing one hundred dollars it will cost several hundred and probably several thousand dollars. If this document were furnished here to the Senate it could not be printed, because the law expressly limits the power of each House to printing matter which costs only $500, and if it were sent here it could not be printed.

When the Official Register comes in it is printed by provisions of law, and it is proposed now that the Senate of the United States shall undertake to change the existing law, a law which we are bound to observe just as much as the humblest citizen of this country, and declare that the Official Register shall be made so and so and so and so. We have no right to add to the requirements of the law; we have no right to change the law; we are as much bound by the law as anybody else.

I say, therefore, that when you undertake by this resolution to require something else to be put in the Official Register which is not provided for by law, and the printing of which Register is provided for and appropriated for by law, you transcend the powers of the Senate. After this Register is made out, at the next session of Congress it may be then very easy for you to ask the Secretary of the Interior to separate this information and to give you new items of information; but it seems to me it is not worth while now to duplicate the labor. I know myself that the cost of the preparation of this document will amount to thousands of dollars; it will take many clerks many months to prepare this information and revise it; and what is the use of our wasting the last hours of this session in this call for information? The document cannot be prepared for months; why not, then, wait until the next session, and in the mean time the information will itself be gathered together in another form and may be communicated then without new preparation. It will cost thousands of dollars; it will be simply a work of supererogation. If this resolution should pass, nothing will be done until the next session of Congress, nothing can be done until after the Official Register is made out. It could not be printed if it were sent here, and it cannot be made up for months.

I trust, therefore, that Senators will allow these subjects which are more proper for legislative business to go over until the regular session of Congress, and then certainly I shall have no objection to any resolution calling for information. Next December we shall have the information before us in the Official Register, and a great deal more, probably, than is called for by this resolution. It will be very easy then, after the biennial compilation is made, for the Interior Department, which has charge of the matter, to divide it up and send this particular information by itself when it is in printed form, without any difficulty.

As I believe this is the only matter of legislative business pending, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business, and I assure Senators no delay will be caused by the operation.

Mr. BROWN. I trust the Senator will not cut off reply in that way. He has misstated the law, and I want to reply. Though he has been Secretary of the Treasury, he does not recollect the law exactly.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not care about going into a long debate; but the law has been submitted to the Attorney-General.

Mr. BROWN. I have it before me, and want to read it and comment on it; and I ask the Senator to withdraw the motion until I do so.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will read it—I have read it a hundred times—to satisfy the Senator; I have it here before me.

Mr. BROWN. It seems to me it would not be quite liberal to cut off my reply by the motion the Senator has made.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will not do that. I have never cut off anybody in my life. I will read the law. It is as follows:

Provided, That on and after January 1, 1876, the appointments of this Department shall be so arranged as to be equally distributed between the several States of the United States, Territories, and the District of Columbia, according to population.

The appointments shall be arranged so as to be equally distributed. What appointments? Not appointments in the past, but appointments in the future; and the whole turns upon the construction of the word "appointments." Does this relate to appointments made thirty years ago; that everybody that has been appointed from the District of Columbia shall be turned out because there were five hundred persons from the District of Columbia and according to the apportionment only seven could be assigned to the District of Columbia? Was this law to be so construed that four hundred and ninety-three persons were suddenly to be discharged in order to make the equalization provided for by the law? No; but the Attorney-General said that the word "appointments" related to appointments to be made in the future and not to those already made in the past; that those appointments to be made in the future should be so arranged as that no State would have more than its proportion. That was the construction put upon the law, and that is the fair construction. Any other construction would have been a wholesale wrong and injury to hundreds of employés. As a matter of course, this has been fully considered, and this construction was submitted to Congress and acquiesced in by Congress, stated over and over again years ago.

I do not wish to cut off the Senator from Georgia, but I wish to proceed with the executive business. If he desires, I cannot refuse to allow him to be heard or to correct me if I have misstated the law.

Mr. KELLOGG. Will the Senator from Georgia allow me?

Mr. BROWN. I yield for a moment.

Mr. PLUMB. I desire to offer an amendment without submitting any remarks; at the end of the resolution to add:

And which of such clerks or employés served in the regular or volunteer service of the United States during the war of the rebellion.

Mr. KELLOGG. Now, Mr. President, in aid of remarks that I presume the Senator from Georgia may intend to submit, I desire to make one single statement, and it will be seen how plain a tale will put all this thing down. I now ask the honorable Senator from Ohio to state to the Senate what number of copies of the Official Register are usually printed by law?

Mr. SHERMAN. The Official Register is a document printed by order of Congress, and either House of Congress may under the law order the printing of as many additional copies as it desires for publication. It is offered for sale and sold to anybody who wants it, at the mere cost of printing; and if not many are distributed it is because not very many are interested in it. I heard the statement made several times by the Senator from Louisiana that only a few were printed. Originally only five hundred were printed, because it was believed that five hundred would be a sufficient number to supply the various officers of the Government who needed it. Now I think the number has been increased to fifteen hundred.

Mr. KELLOGG. About one thousand.

Mr. SHERMAN. Well, one thousand is enough to supply the officers of the Government. Anybody who wants the Register can buy it of the Public Printer at the cost of printing.

Mr. KELLOGG. So it is only the officers of the Government who want the information! Should not others have a chance of getting it? The officers of the Government get it gratis, if they choose to go through two volumes of sixty to a hundred thousand names, with not all the information required by this resolution in the books, and not all the information that is necessary to ascertain who these appointees are either. Persons can go and pay five dollars a volume if they want that meager information, unless they go to a member of Congress and search through one of the thousand copies that are authorized by law to be printed; and the expense of which is enormous. The honorable Senator from Ohio says, if we want more information we can have more copies. So you will publish more copies of these immense volumes rather than publish five or six thousand names that would be required to be published under this resolution, when this book contains perhaps a hundred thousand.

Now, another word. The law reads that "on and after the passage of the act." I undertake to say that from the cursory examination I have made—and I admit it is not critical; I have made it as to two or three States—as to my own State there are twenty appointees to one that was made prior to 1875—twenty of them made since, and in some of the Northern States the proportion is nearly as great, I am told. Great changes in all these Departments take place. Have 60 per cent. of the appointments been made in conformity with the law? I ask the Senator who was Secretary of the Treasury [Mr. SHERMAN] will he tell me that in the last five years there has been more than 60 per cent. of the various employés of the Government appointed in conformity with the laws I have read? Whether these laws have been complied with or not the very information that we seek by this resolution, namely, the date of the appointment, will disclose. You cannot find the date of appointment in the Blue Book; that is the very root of the whole thing; let us have the date of the appointment, and we can tell whether the law of 1875 has been complied with or not, whether appointments made since the passage of the law have been made in conformity with the plain and explicit requirements of the law.

Now, I will ask the honorable Senator to find in the Blue Book the date of a single appointment made by the Treasury Department. The law says on and after the passage of the act of 1875 the appointments are to be made in conformity with certain requirements.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, I stated the fact when I was on the floor a few moments ago that the act of 1875 required appointments to be made by the Treasury Department in proportion to the population of the respective States, Territories, and District of Columbia. The honorable Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] said that I misstated it, that that was not what was required. I said nothing about the dismissal of anybody appointed prior to 1876. I stated distinctly in reply to the Senator from Vermont that I sought to disturb nobody who was appointed during the war. I said I did not believe that the appointments had been fairly made since 1876. I say that now, and I am prepared to show it whenever I can get the information as to the date of the appointments. The Senator has read the law and it sustains what I said. I stated it correctly, but I will read it again:

Provided, That on and after January 1, 1876, the appointments of this Department shall be so arranged as to be equally distributed between the several States of the United States, Territories, and the District of Columbia, according to population.

That is exactly in substance as I stated the law when I was on the floor. I say it has not been fairly and justly administered, and we want this information so that we can bring the proper influences, or the proper legislation, if necessary, to bear upon the head of the Department if he does not administer that law. The honorable Senator from Ohio is mistaken, too, when he says that the Blue Book furnishes this information. As has been stated by the Senator from Louisiana who has just taken his seat, it gives us the date of the appointment of no one. That is the very thing we want to get at. We go to the Treasury Department to make inquiry about the matter, to know whether there is a vacancy from a particular State. They tell you there is no vacancy in the Department. You inquire whether your State has had its quota. You are put off by being told they will look into it. You cannot tell. You are told, however, that the law only applies to appointments made since the act of 1875. We do not know until we can have the information as to the date of appointment how many were appointed before and how many since. That is carefully kept out of the Blue Book. One of the very objects of the resolution is to give that to the Senate and the country, as the Blue Book does not give it. The other object is to give the color of each appointee. It is not pretended that is in the Blue Book; it is not pretended that either that or the date of appointment will be in the forthcoming Blue Book; and we want this information in order to give these facts to the country that the Blue Book does not give.

But it is very expensive, very expensive to publish or print such a report, and we are reminded that the Senate cannot order the printing of more than $500 worth in a job of this character. It will not take, as the Senator from Louisiana has stated, probably $100 to print it. It will be a short document. You need not be alarmed on that point. We are not proposing to go beyond the $500; but suppose we do not print it at all, then where is the legal objection? If the information is laid upon the table of the Senate we can get at it, then we can get information that no Blue Book, or any other book that is published now, gives us, by going there and reading it; and if the United States is not able to print so important a document, if it is too great a drain on the Treasury, or if we might go beyond our limit in printing it, we will simply ask for the information and let it lie on the table; and when Congress meets, if they should think it important, possibly they may reach the point of getting it printed in some way. If it is really too expensive ever to be printed, we shall have access to it; and if a Senator wants to know whether justice has been done to his State or not, he can look at it and see.

Why, then, I repeat, all this opposition? I am rather inclined to suspect that the real point in it is that you do not want the Blue Book or any other report made from these Departments to show the color of each individual there. I say the people of the United States have a right to know that as well as to know when each was appointed.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I have procured a copy of the names of all the employés under the Treasury Department in the United States. I hold between my hands [exhibiting] the paper that contains a list of all the employés that can possibly be included in this resolution under the Treasury Department. I have been all through the book. It contains the light-house service, the custom-house service, the assay offices, the revenue-marine service, captains, lieutenants, &c., the Register's Office, the Comptroller's Office, the Treasurer's Office, everything except the simple Bureau of Engraving and Printing. The Senate will see that all this is included in a few pages.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. BROWN. On that motion I call for the yeas and nays, as I think this resolution ought to be acted on.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. [Putting the question.] The Chair is in doubt as to the result.

Mr. PLUMB and others called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JONES, of Florida, (when his name was called.) I am paired temporarily with the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. ANTHONY.] I do not know how he would vote on this motion and therefore I refrain from voting.

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 23, nays 27; as follows:

YEAS—23.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question recurs on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] to the resolution of the Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. KELLOGG.]

Several SENATORS. Let the amendment be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add at the end of the resolution:

And which of such clerks or employés served in the regular or volunteer service of the United States during the war of the rebellion.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I should like to inquire what is the importance of that information?"

Mr. PLUMB. The law requires that preference shall be given to that class of people, and as the purpose of this information is to find out whether the law has been complied with or not, I regard that as a very essential part of the inquiry.

Mr. SAULSBURY. My impression is that the best thing we could do if we had the power would be to repeal any such law. There has been too much discrimination between the people of this country. There are other people besides soldiers. They are very meritorious people, but there are a great many people in civil life as worthy as men who have served in the Army, and I see no special reason why this preference should be continued to one particular class of the community to the prejudice of another.

Mr. PLUMB. This does not propose to continue the law; it is only a call for information on which to base legislation or other action.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the resolution as amended.

Mr. INGALLS. Now let the resolution as amended be reported.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution as amended will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretaries of State, Treasury, Interior, War, Navy, and the Postmaster-General be directed to transmit to the Senate the names of all officers, clerks, and other employés borne upon their rolls, respectively, not required to be confirmed by the Senate, and the salary paid to each, together with the date of their appointment, the State to which each is charged, the grade of office held, the compensation received, and whether each of said officers, clerks, or employés is white or colored, and which of such clerks or employés served in the regular or volunteer service of the United States during the war of the rebellion.

Mr. HOAR. I suggest an amendment by adding "or in any other service." [Laughter.]

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. If we are to have a complete list of employés why not include the Department of Justice, I ask the mover of the resolution? Though I am not in favor of the resolution specially, I think if we are to have the general information, that Department ought to be included. I move that the Department of Justice be included.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. KELLOGG. I accept it by adding "and the Attorney-General."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be so modified. The question is on the resolution as amended.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

VISITOR TO NAVAL ACADEMY.

The VICE-PRESIDENT appointed Mr. MILLER a member of the Board of Visitors on the part of the Senate to attend the annual examination of the cadets at the United States Naval Academy at Annapolis, Maryland, in place of Mr. ALLISON, resigned.

REGENTS OF SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION.

The VICE-PRESIDENT appointed Mr. HILL, of Colorado, and Mr. MAXEY Regents on the part of the Senate of the Smithsonian Institution to fill the vacancies caused by the expiration of the term of service as Senator of Mr. Newton Booth and Mr. Robert E. Withers.

COLUMBIA HOSPITAL FOR WOMEN.

The VICE-PRESIDENT appointed Mr. ROLLINS a director on the part of the Senate of the Columbia Hospital for Women and Lying-in Asylum, to fill the vacancy occasioned by the expiration of the term of service as Senator of Mr. Francis Kernan.

CONSULAR FEES.

Mr. BECK. I rise to ask for the passage of a certain resolution sent to me from New York this morning, calling for information. I hope the Secretary will read it, and then if any Senator objects it can go over, but I think there will be no objection. I send to the desk the resolution which I offer.

Mr. INGALLS. Will the Senator state what the resolution is?

Mr. HARRIS. Let it be reported for information.

Mr. BECK. I can state in a moment the nature of it. Some of the importing houses in New York are complaining very much of orders that are being issued by the consuls at Liverpool and elsewhere, who instead of charging $2.50 for certifying invoices are charging fifteen shillings or $3.75, and there is not uniformity in the collection. These charges are onerous on the merchants, and the resolution calls on the President to inform us whether or not they are making excessive charges. The resolution will explain itself.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be, and he hereby is, requested to forthwith inquire of each consular officer of the United States respecting the following matters, and to transmit to the Senate on the first day of the next meeting of Congress a full and complete statement of the information received in reply:

1. Whether any consular officer of the United States has during the last fiscal year demanded or received for the verification of any invoice and certificate a greater sum as a fee than $2.50; and if so, the name of said officer?

2. Whether any consular officer of the United States has during the same period required the declaration attached to invoices according to section 2854 of the Revised Statutes to be verified by oath, and if such oath has been demanded then before whom has it been taken, and has any fee in addition to the consular fee of $2.50 been exacted for administering the oath? If any such additional fee for the oath has been exacted in any consulate or commercial office of the United States, what has been the amount of such fee for each invoice, and what the total amount received from such fees in such office during the last fiscal year, and to whom paid; and have such fees been included in the consular fees and returned to the Government; and has any consul-general, consul, or commercial agent been personally benefitted thereby, and if so, to what extent?

3. What sum has been received and retained as consular fees by each consular and commercial officer of the United States during the past fiscal year, and what sum has been paid to each as salary for the same period; and are consular and commercial officers of the United States permitted to receive and retain any fees for any services as such consular and commercial officers which are not stated in the consular returns?

And that the President of the United States be, and he hereby is, requested to inform the Senate whether the existing laws of the United States require that the declaration to be indorsed on invoices of merchandise to be imported into the United States shall be accompanied by an oath of the person making the declaration.

Mr. HOAR. I would suggest to the mover of the resolution if the matter is to be examined into at all, as I presume it is of importance from his introducing it, whether it would not be better to direct the Secretary of State to do these things. The Senate have no power in dealing with the President except to make a request, whereas we can order the Secretary of State to do this, it being information which we can obtain in his Department. It seems to me that the official etiquette would hardly be complied with by having the President of the United States in personal communication with every petty consul all over the world. I would suggest, therefore, that the beginning of the resolution be modified.

Mr. BECK. The Senator will allow me. The Senator from Ohio can perhaps state it better than I can, but I think that it would require the action of both the Secretary of the Treasury and the Secretary of State to give us the information sought for there, and the President can obtain it from those two Cabinet officers much more easily than we could by asking either one of them. I believe we shall obtain it better by requesting the President to obtain it, and he will have to consult both those officers in order to obtain it. I think so, and therefore I would like to have it go in the form in which it is. That was the object of asking the President.

Mr. HOAR. I understand that all the consular officers are under the control of the Secretary of State and I believe some of the minor consular officers are appointed by him. They are in his Department, all of them; all the official correspondence with them—except as to the matter of accounts, which comes in from various Departments to the Secretary of the Treasury—is with the Secretary of State. It seems to me that it is important to observe the forms and proprieties of our relations with the President of the United States, and that it is not in accordance with usage to request the President of the United States to put himself in personal communication with the most subordinate officers of the State Department. There is nothing the Secretary of the Treasury will have to do with this; and it is wholly in the discretion of the President whether to comply with our request at all. The Senate has the right to speak with authority to the Secretary of State, and it becomes the duty of the Secretary of State to obtain from his subordinates any information that we desire.

Mr. BECK. Allow me to make this suggestion: we shall not be apt to adjourn to-day, I think; and perhaps it would be well to let the resolution lie over until to-morrow morning and have it printed, and I will then call on the Secretary of State in the morning and see what form will do most good.

Mr. HOAR. I submit it to the discretion of the Senator himself. I think the best way is to have the resolution lie over.

Mr. BECK. Let it go over and be printed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That order will be made.

Mr. HARRIS. I hope the Senator from Kentucky will not assume that we shall not be able to adjourn to-day. I very much hope we can, and I very much hope we shall.

Mr. BECK. Then, rather than run the risk of any delay in that regard, I will accept the suggestion of the Senator from Massachusetts and strike out the words "the President of the United States" and insert "the Secretary of State," and change "requested" to "directed."

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to say a single word in relation to this matter. Similar information came to me in relation to the consuls in Italy. Gross abuses were charged upon the consuls in Italy about their charging consular fees. I made an investigation, and I believe that in every instance I found that the charges were correct, with this exception, that they had charged a fee for certifying the difference between the gold rate and the rate of paper money. I do not think there was anything else found that was wrong.

Mr. BECK. I do not know that there is anything wrong here; but it is well to know the facts. For fear we might not get the information I will modify the resolution to meet the views of the Senator from Massachusetts, and ask that it be now acted on.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be so modified. The question is on the resolution as modified.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

GENERAL LAND OFFICE.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask for the consideration of the resolution which I offered on the 17th instant relative to the General Land Office.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution submitted by Mr. MORGAN on the 17th instant, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands is instructed to take into consideration the condition of the General Land Office with respect to the classification of the officers and employés thereof, the convenient arrangement and security of the files and records of said office, and the provision of additional room for the transaction of the business thereof.

2. That said committee have leave to sit during the recess of the Senate, to employ a stenographer, and to send for persons and papers.

Mr. MORGAN. I will make a very brief explanation of the resolution to the Senate. In the last report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office he says:

The question of room for the use of this bureau has become an important one. There is now urgent need for larger space for the proper, safe, and economical transaction of its business and the preservation of its records. The space available for desks is now overcrowded; the file-rooms are filled to their utmost capacity; the meager space now available for desks and files has been preserved by thrusting out into the public halls of the Department building some of the most important records of the office; should they be returned to the proper rooms, where they are in hourly demand, and where upon every consideration of their great value and importance they ought, for safety, to be, there would be left no working space whatever. The records thus insecurely placed are mainly the "tract-books." They are the only indexes found in the General Land Office by which its varied transactions can be traced, and are in themselves, in a large sense, the original evidences of title to an estate found by the last census to be valued at $4,749,409,940.

The relief which this system of storage has heretofore given has reached its utmost limit; space in the halls available for the purpose is now exhausted, and the daily accumulation of letters, returns, and records must henceforward trench on the now too limited working-room unless relief can be found by the assignment of additional rooms within the Department building.

* * * * * * *

After the necessity for a reorganization of this office has been thus called to the attention of Congress for nine successive years by three different Commissioners and by a commission of eminent men appointed under an act of Congress for the specific purpose of ascertaining the condition of the public-land system of laws and service, I am constrained to believe that further evidence to show that the public interests require a thorough reorganization of the clerical force of this office should be altogether unnecessary. The reasons, however, upon which said annual recommendations were based are continually assuming a more imperative character.

The following is a statement of the clerical force of this office, exclusive of messengers, laborers, and packers, annually provided, commencing with 1876:

For the year ending June 30, 1876	156
For the year ending June 30, 1877	145
For the year ending June 30, 1878	145
For the year ending June 30, 1879	151
For the year ending June 30, 1880	195
For the year ending June 30, 1881	195

The work of the office in 1876 was largely in arrears.

The total disposals of lands in the year 1876 were 6,524,326.36 acres. The total disposals in 1880 were 14,792,371.65 acres, showing an increase of over 126 per cent. The increase in the clerical force in 1880 over 1876 was about 26 per cent.

* * * * * * *

Laws have multiplied; no session of Congress closes without new and paried legislation involving the public lands. Lands are of greater value than formerly, and as the country is settled and filled up this increase in value will continue, and with it contests by conflicting claimants will be more numerous and more vigorously prosecuted. The existing cases, which have been pending and in controversy for years, are complicated and difficult, requiring for their correct disposition the best legal talent. The mineral lands are inviting the capital and enterprise of the country for their development; and these cases, not unfrequently involving millions of dollars in value, and in which the best legal talent of the country is employed as counsel, manifestly should be examined and decided by able lawyers; and the controversies growing out of conflicting claims of every character, all render it simply beyond reasonable question by any sensible person that a high standard of ability in those who decide these cases, involving the homes and fortunes of individuals no less than the public interests dependent upon peace of title and the sound administration of law, is imperatively demanded. Yet it will be seen, by a comparison of the clerical force provided in 1876 with that for the present year, that the increase is almost entirely represented by clerks at salaries of $1,200, $1,000, and $900.

Now, while a limited number of copyists can be profitably used, yet, with a practical personal knowledge of this office and its work since the spring of 1876 I would be recreant to my trust should I fail to declare with the greatest emphasis that it is absolutely absurd to expect that the immense and varied interests adjusted by this office can be properly disposed of by clerks who can be hired at $1,000, $1,200, or $1,400 salaries.

The necessity of this office is able men of legal education and mature judgment, and without them the administration of its affairs must be measurably defective and discreditable.

With the force employed at the salaries now provided it practically results that a very few of the ablest men in the entire office are overworked days, nights, and Sundays, in the effort to properly perform the grave duties imposed by law; and it is beyond question necessary that a higher grade of ability should be secured than can be had in the market at the low salaries above named.

The history of this office for the past ten years proves the almost invariable rule to be that its ablest men resigned from the office after acquiring proficiency in the business for more lucrative positions. Whenever a man is employed who developes uncommon ability and value it is confidently expected that he will remain for a limited time only. The work is difficult, and the pay is insignificant in comparison; hence the result cannot be doubtful.

* * * * * * *

The large and increasing accumulation of tract-books, plats of surveys, field-notes of surveys, records of patents, registers of official papers, records of correspondence, dockets of contested claims, returns of registers and receivers, records of testimony in contested cases, and the files of ex parte entries and proof, and correspondence, &c., occupy a very large space. The rooms are crowded with clerks' desks, books, files, &c., and large numbers of tract-books, which contain the record of every entry, filing, selection, grant, or other disposition of every tract, and which have to be consulted continually in the daily work of the office, as well as records of patents, are stored in the corridors of the building to a degree rendering these invaluable records insecure, and involving a vast and unnecessary waste of labor, both by reason of their position remote from the clerks, and the fact that the light is so dim that the books have to be carried to some place where light can be secured and then returned again to their places.

The want of sufficient and conveniently arranged rooms unquestionably involves a large percentage of loss annually, and I feel well assured that were this fully remedied the saving to the Government, in work accomplished, would in a few years actually reimburse it for the expenses necessary to construct the proper building to accommodate the office and preserve its records for all time. Much of the business of this office is far removed from merely clerical work, and the embarrassments resulting from examination of large records of testimony, and writing important and difficult decisions, in rooms overcrowded with clerks engaged in various duties, can be readily understood. No well regulated private business would fail to receive improvement in the respect named.

* * * * * * *

In conclusion, I frankly acknowledge my embarrassment in presenting again the pressing necessity for a thorough reorganization of this office. Every year for ten years last past the same subject has been called to the earnest attention of Congress. The leading men in the office have with almost superhuman efforts labored unceasingly to sustain the character of the bureau and carry forward its great work, the adjudication of the land titles of our vast territory, which has swiftly been organized into wealthy and populous States. The magnitude, the difficulty, and the national importance of the work can hardly be overstated, and it would seem self-evident that it cannot be done, and well done, except by able men, and, so far, no provision at all commensurate with the magnitude of the interests involved has been made.

My attention was drawn to this report which presents in the form of extracts from the reports of three commissioners, extending over the period of nine years, an embarrassment growing out of the want of office-room in the General Land Office that is becoming a serious detriment to the public service and endangering the safety of the records on which titles to millions and millions of acres in this country rest; and I therefore drew the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands to it, who has had it under consideration now for some time, and he is entirely persuaded that this matter cannot be reached otherwise than by an investigation by the committee or a subcommittee during the recess of Congress. We do not have the time when we are here giving attention to the actual business of legislation to make the investigations that are necessary to remedy the difficulty which has now become a very serious embarrassment to the service.

The truth is, that as to a large part of the business of the General Land Office one-third of the time of the officials is wasted in merely carrying the records from cellars and dark places to the light where they can be observed. The records are exposed in the open hall-way of the Interior Department, the most valuable and important records belonging to the Government are exposed there to the danger of fire and even to the danger of theft. The subject has become one of such great importance that the Committee on Public Lands have considered it to be their duty to ask the Senate to allow them to investigate it in the vacation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. COCKRELL in the chair.) The question is on the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

M'DONALD'S COMPILATION OF QUESTIONS OF ORDER.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to whom was referred the resolution submitted by Mr. MORGAN on the 11th inst., directing the Secretary of the Senate to pay $300 to the legal representative of W. J. McDonald, deceased, reported it without amendment.

By unanimous consent the resolution was read three times and passed, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate is hereby authorized and directed to pay to the legal representative of W. J. McDonald, deceased, the sum of $300 for "a compilation of questions of order and decisions thereon," prepared by the said W. J. McDonald, deceased; the same to be paid out of the miscellaneous items of the contingent fund of the Senate.

Mr. HARRIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After one hour and fifty minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at three o'clock and twenty minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess till four o'clock p. m., at which time the Senate reassembled in executive session. After one hour and forty-two minutes spent therein the doors were reopened.

Mr. PENDLETON. Very well; let it go over for the present.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will go over.

Mr. HARRIS. What disposition was made of the resolution of the Senator from Ohio?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection being made it went over temporarily.

Mr. HARRIS. It was simply postponed for the present, and liable to be called up at any time?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Such is the understanding.

MICHAEL P. BOYTON.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, transmitting a report of the Secretary of State in response to Senate resolution of the 12th ultimo touching the case of Michael P. Boyton; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed.

THANKS TO VICE-PRESIDENT.

Mr. PENDLETON submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the thanks of the Senate are due and are hereby tendered to the Vice-President for the courtesy, ability, and impartiality with which he has presided over its deliberations during the present session.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair) put the question on the resolution, and it was agreed to unanimously.

Mr. INGALLS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five hours spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be directed to examine into the affairs of the Soldiers' Home at Washington, during the recess, and report upon the same the second Monday of December next, and be entitled to employ a stenographer, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

Mr. JONAS submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay the salaries for the current month, upon the adjournment of the special session of the Senate.

FINAL ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. PENDLETON, (at five o'clock and fifteen minutes p. m.) I move that the Senate do now adjourn sine die.

PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES OF THE FORTY-SEVENTH CONGRESS.

SPECIAL SESSION OF THE SENATE.

SENATE.

MONDAY, October 10, 1881.

In pursuance of the proclamation of September 23, 1881, issued by President Arthur (James A. Garfield, the late President of the United States, having died on the 19th of September, and the powers and duties of the office having, in conformity with the Constitution, devolved upon Vice-President Arthur) the Senate convened to-day in special session at the Capitol in the city of Washington.

PRAYER.

Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D., Chaplain to the Senate, offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, our heavenly Father, in obedience to the call of the President of the United States, we have met together this day. We meet under circumstances of the greatest solemnity, for since our last meeting it has seemed good unto Thee in Thine inscrutable wisdom to permit the messenger of death to remove from this world by the hand of violence the distinguished head of this nation.

We mourn also the death of a Senator greatly beloved and honored; and the respected Secretary, and other officers of this body. We would bow submissively to Thy will, beseeching Thee to sanctify to us these solemn events. Deeply impress upon our minds a sense of our mortality, of the shortness and uncertainty of life; and may we so live as ever to be ready for our departure when it shall be Thy will to call us hence.

We pray for the bereaved family of the deceased President of these United States. Sustain and comfort them in the time of their severe affliction.

Most Gracious God, we offer up our sincere and earnest prayers for Thy servant who has been called in Thy providence to succeed to the Chief Magistracy of this great people. May he be plenteously endued with heavenly grace and wisdom to aid him in the discharge of the high trust which has been committed to his hands. Make him a blessing to the whole country and to the world.

And now, our Heavenly Father, we invoke Thine especial blessing upon the Senate now assembled. Preside over their deliberations, guide their councils, and lead them to such action as shall redound to Thy glory and to the best interests of our common country.

Most Merciful God, we implore Thy grace and the forgiveness of all our sins. These and all other blessings we ask in the name of Christ, our Divine Redeemer. Amen.

Mr. HARRIS. I have been requested by a number of Senators on both sides of the Chamber to call the Senate to order. If there be no objection, I will do so in order that we may proceed with the business for which the Senate is convened. [Taking the chair.] The Senate will please come to order, and the Chief Clerk will report to the Senate the proclamation of the President convening this session of the Senate.

The Chief Clerk (Mr. FRANCIS E. SHOBER) read the following proclamation:

By the President of the United States of America.

A PROCLAMATION.

Whereas objects of interest to the United States require that the Senate should be convened at an early day to receive and act upon such communications as may be made to it on the part of the Executive:

Now, therefore, I, Chester A. Arthur, President of the United States, have considered it to be my duty to issue this, my proclamation, declaring that an extraordinary occasion requires the Senate of the United States to convene for the transaction of business at the Capitol, in the city of Washington, on Monday, the 10th of October next, at noon on that day, of which all who shall at that time be entitled to act as members of that body are hereby required to take notice.

Given under my hand and the seal of the United States, at Washington, the 23d day of September, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and eighty-one, and of the Independence of the United States the one hundred and sixth.

[SEAL.] CHESTER A. ARTHUR.

By the President:

JAMES G. BLAINE, Secretary of State.

ELECTION OF PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE.

Mr. PENDLETON. Mr. President, I offer the following resolution, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. HARRIS.) The Senator from Ohio offers a resolution, for which he asks present consideration. The Chief Clerk will report it.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That THOMAS F. BAYARD, a Senator from the State of Delaware, is hereby chosen President pro tempore of the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. Chairman, I of course do not object to the present consideration of that resolution, but under existing circumstances I think it to be a duty, in accordance with the rules of the Senate, to present the credentials of Mr. Warner Miller and Mr. E. G. Lapham, Senators elected from the State of New York to fill the vacancies occasioned by the resignation of Senator Conkling and Senator Platt, from that State, and also the credentials of Mr. Nelson W. Aldrich, of Rhode Island, elected as a Senator by the Legislature of that State, in conformity with law, to fill the vacancy occasioned by the death of our late associate, Senator Burnside.

In order that my friend from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] and the other Senators may not think that this is an inappropriate time to do this thing, I beg to read from the rule of the Senate on that subject. It is the seventh rule:

> The presentation of the credentials of Senators-elect and other questions of privilege shall always be in order, except during the reading and correction of the Journal, while a question of order or a motion to adjourn is pending, or while the Senate is dividing; and all questions and motions arising or made upon the presentation of such credentials shall be proceeded with until disposed of by the Senate.

I therefore, sir, send these credentials to the Chair and ask that they be read respectively.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the credentials will be reported to the Senate. The Chair hears no objection, and he instructs the Chief Clerk to report the credentials to the Senate.

The Chief Clerk read the credentials of Nelson W. Aldrich, chosen by the Legislature of Rhode Island a Senator from that State to fill the vacancy caused by the death of Ambrose E. Burnside in the term ending March 3, 1887.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. These credentials will lie upon the table. The Chief Clerk will now report the credentials of Mr. Lapham.

The Chief Clerk read the credentials of Elbridge G. Lapham, chosen by the Legislature of New York a Senator from that State to fill the vacancy caused by the resignation of Roscoe Conkling in the term ending March 3, 1885.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. These credentials will lie upon the table. The Chief Clerk will now report the credentials of Mr. Miller.

The Chief Clerk read the credentials of Warner Miller, chosen by the Legislature of New York a Senator from that State to fill the vacancy caused by the resignation of Thomas C. Platt in the term ending March 3, 1887.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The credentials will lie upon the table.

Mr. EDMUNDS. These credentials having been read, and the gentlemen named therein being now present ready to take the oath of office, I move, in accordance with the precedents of the Senate, that the oath of office to these Senators be now administered by Hon. HENRY B. ANTHONY, the oldest member of the Senate in continuous service.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] moves that the oath of office be administered to the Senators-elect by Senator HENRY B. ANTHONY, the senior Senator of the body. Is the Senate ready for the question?

Mr. PENDLETON. I move that the motion of the Senator from Vermont do lie upon the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is moved by the Senator from Ohio that the motion of the Senator from Vermont lie upon the table.

Mr. EDMUNDS. On that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. PLATT, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Nevada, [Mr. FAIR.] This pair was arranged by my friends, who had authority to make it, at a time when it was supposed it would be inconvenient for me to attend the session of the Senate; and I shall recognize and respect the pair.

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 36, nays 34; as follows:

YEAS—36.

Bayard,	Farley,	Jackson,	Pugh,
Beck,	Garland,	Johnston,	Ransom,
Brown,	George,	Jonas,	Saulsbury,
Butler,	Gorman,	Jones of Florida,	Slater,
Call,	Groome,	Lamar,	Vance,
Camden,	Grover,	McPherson,	Vest,
Cockrell,	Hampton,	Maxey,	Voorhees,
Coke,	Harris,	Morgan,	Walker,
Davis of W. Va.,	Hill of Georgia,	Pendleton,	Williams.

NAYS—34.

Allison	Edmunds,	Jones of Nevada,	Rollins,
Anthony,	Ferry,	Kellogg,	Saunders,
Blair,	Frye,	Logan,	Sawyer,
Cameron of Pa.,	Hale,	McDill,	Sewell,
Cameron of Wis.,	Harrison,	McMillan,	Sherman,
Conger,	Hawley,	Miller,	Teller,
Davis of Illinois,	Hill of Colorado,	Mitchell,	Van Wyck.
Dawes,	Hoar,	Morrill,
Edgerton,	Ingalls,	Plumb,

ABSENT—3.

Fair,	Mahone,	Platt.

So the motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I had supposed that some conclusive and overpowering reason would have been given by my honorable friend from Ohio for asking a majority of this body to refuse to admit the Senators from two States lawfully elected, whose credentials had been read and against whom no objection had been interposed, the right to take the oaths of office and to participate in the first as well as the later deliberations of this body. None was given, and therefore there was no opportunity after the motion to lay upon the table was made for any reasoning or discussion upon such a subject, if there could be any possible for man to conceive.

Now, in order to have the opportunity to again test the sense of the Senate and to endeavor to find out what it means upon this subject, I move to amend the resolution offered by the Senator from Ohio by striking out all after the word "Resolved" therein, and inserting what I send to the Chair. I hardly think that will go to the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont will please suspend until the Chair inquires if there is objection to the present consideration of the resolution of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I stated that there was none at all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection to the present consideration of the resolution, and therefore the amendment of the Senator from Vermont will now be reported to the Senate.

The CHIEF CLERK. The proposed amendment is to strike out all after the word "Resolved" and to insert:

> That the credentials of Messrs. Warner Miller and Elbridge G. Lapham, Senators-elect from the State of New York, and of Nelson W. Aldrich, a Senator from the State of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations, elected to fill the vacancy caused by the death of the late Senator Ambrose E. Burnside, having been read, be placed on the files of the Senate, and that the oaths prescribed by the Constitution and laws be administered to said Senators by Mr. HENRY B. ANTHONY, the senior Senator in service.

Mr. BAYARD. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont, upon which the yeas and nays have been demanded.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I should certainly have expected, as I remarked a little while ago, that any member of this body, not to say a majority of the members who are now sworn in, would hardly fail, when endeavoring to exclude the Senators from sister States from participation in the body, to give some very conclusive reason for it. None has been given; it seems that none is proposed to be given; and now I will take the liberty of stating the reason for it, if, as I said before, there need be any statement in advance of a reason for it.

It is true that we have met under extraordinary circumstances occasioned by events the consequences of which may have put it within the legal, technical power of a bare majority of the States conditionally to provide for the presidential succession, when, if their sister States were consulted, a different provision might be made—to provide for it under circumstances when, in order to make the provision they may desire, it is necessary that other States whose relations to the Union and whose right to representation appear in your own records now upon your table, and whose chosen representatives stand here ready to do their duty, shall be excluded in order that a minority of the forces in this Government may accomplish a grave purpose which they could not accomplish were the voices of all the States ready to be taken and entitled to be taken consulted.

I state this proposition, sir, in the simplest possible language, certainly without exaggeration and certainly without epithet or unkind comment. There is the fact, if the indication we have had by the previous vote of the Senate is to be taken as evidence that this course is to be persisted in, the same course with equal constitutional and legal propriety,—no more, no less,—may be continued for the whole of the number of years that each one of the three Senators whose credentials have been read is entitled to fill a seat in this body; and it would seem logically that the only ground upon which such a course of exclusion could be discontinued would be that there was nothing else to be gained by persistence, and that the sovereign States in this Union of States, whose equality of voice and representation the Constitution took pains to declare should never be diminished or excluded without their own consent in this body (even by an amendment of the Constitution) are to depend upon the political idea of what is expedient for a temporary majority as to whether they shall have places at all, and if they are to have places at all they are not to have them until purposes can be accomplished that could not be accomplished were their lawful voice heard.

Is that the case? I only put it interrogatively. I should not dare to suspect that there could be such a case if I had not seen the evidence of this vote and I have been unable to comprehend upon what principle such a vote could have been given.

Somebody has said—I have seen it stated in the newspapers; it has not been stated here—that the law of Congress requires that the oath of office of a Senator-elect should be administered by the President of the Senate, either the Vice-President, the constitutional President of the Senate, or the President pro tempore acting in his absence, and that this law is an exclusive law, by implication forbidding any other administration of such an oath, and hence that it is impossible legally to admit these gentlemen until there shall be a President pro tempore who can fulfill the statute and administer the oath. I must suppose (because, as I said, I must disarm myself from suspicion of political views) that to be the reason which actuated my honorable friend in moving to lay upon the table the resolution that I had the honor to offer.

I wish to say in the briefest possible manner that if my friend will look at the act of 1789 he will see that it was passed by a Senate and signed by a President pro tempore of the Senate, not one of whom had taken the oath prescribed by the Constitution. I do not speak of that as showing that the act is not a valid act; far from it; I speak of it as showing that when the just exigency of the case arises, this body as well as every other parliamentary body is entitled to receive members who otherwise are a part of it, and to act, if there be no means of acting otherwise, on the very first question as well as the last one that may be presented to the body, without taking an oath at all.

I repeat that for weeks and weeks the first Senate of the fathers, who had built the Constitution, did not find it inappropriate to admit Senators from all the States and to proceed to business, merely from the circumstance that there did not exist an officer who by law could administer an oath. My friends on the other side may say, "That is this case now; there is no officer who by law can administer the oath." Are we to be wiser or more critical than the fathers? If there be no officer to administer this oath, are we to say that two States—it might be seventeen States or it might be twenty-seven States, taking the constitutional term and the accidents of life—are to be excluded from any voice respecting the selection of the presiding officer of this body because the particular mode that a statute has pointed out cannot be effectuated? I do not think so, Mr. President.

There was a time, something like the present perhaps, when a great and controlling party in this country possessed members whose memories now, though they are gone, have lent a splendor to the history, legal as well as political, of this country, who did not feel that they were violating the Constitution of the United States by doing precisely what I have proposed and now propose here.

On the 4th of March, 1853, the Senate of the United States met on the special call of the President of the United States in what is called an executive or senatorial session. There was no President pro tempore in the chair. There was one at the session before, who undoubtedly might have taken the chair and administered the oath to Senators-elect. For some reason, perhaps of personal delicacy, certainly none that I know of that is open to any criticism, he did not. What then? Did the Senate, at whose head then as oldest in service stood Lewis Cass of Michigan, and whose honorable coadjutors were Mr. Badger of North Carolina, Mr. Gwin and Mr. Weller of California, Mr. Houston and Mr. Rusk of Texas, Messrs. Dodge and Jones of Iowa, Messrs. Mallory and Morton of Florida, Mr. Borland and Mr. Sebastian of Arkansas, Messrs. Atchison and Geyer of Missouri, Mr. Hamlin of Maine, Mr. Fitzpatrick of Alabama, Stephen A. Douglas of Illinois, a name still bright with real democratic fame; that great and patriotic soldier James Shields; Messrs. Chase and Wade of Ohio, Messrs. Benjamin and Soulé of Louisiana, Mr. Jones of Tennessee, Messrs. Dawson and Toombs of Georgia, and a long list of others from all the Northern and Eastern States whom I might name—did they feel that this act of 1789 was to exclude a single man whose credentials were presented and regular in form from taking part in the election of a President pro tempore of the Senate? Not at all. On that occasion, with this statute before their eyes, the Senate being called to order as it was on this occasion, with the single exception that it was called to order by the oldest Senator in service, but called to order as it has been wisely and properly on this occasion by one of our own number, no matter who—

On motion by Mr. Badger, and by unanimous consent,

Resolved, That the oath prescribed by the Constitution be administered to the new members of the Senate by the Hon. Lewis Cass, the oldest member of the Senate—

I read from the Journal—

The credentials of the following Senators having been heretofore read,— the oath prescribed by law was administered to them by the Hon. Lewis Cass, and they took their seats in the Senate, namely:

As is now this case—

Mr. Atherton from New Hampshire, Mr. Benjamin from Louisiana, Mr. Clayton from Delaware, Mr. Evans from South Carolina, Mr. Everett from Massachusetts, Mr. Houston from Texas, Mr. Hunter from Virginia, Mr. Jones from Iowa, Mr. Sebastian from Arkansas, Mr. Stuart from Michigan, Mr. Thompson from Kentucky, Mr. Thomson from New Jersey, Mr. Toombs from Georgia, Mr. Wright from New Jersey, and Mr. Douglas from Illinois. That having been done—

Mr. Shields submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved unanimously, That the Hon. David R. Atchison continue President of the Senate pro tempore.

You will see, therefore, Mr. President, that although it is true that often and often when the mere convenience of the moment made it more agreeable and when nothing was in question about which Senators might be divided Presidents pro tempore have been elected and then administered the oath, yet here the Senate of the United States, composed of men who at that time, in that period, probably were as eminent, as wise, as scrupulously careful of the Constitution as any that had preceded them, (it would perhaps not be parliamentary for me to say any who have succeeded them,) thought it was their duty, before they proceeded to the disposition of the question of the presiding officer of the Senate, to swear in the new Senators, and to swear them in in that way.

How did they get over the statute? somebody will ask. It is not to be supposed that they thought they were violating it, for if they were violating a lawful and constitutional statute they were violating their own oaths, for they had all sworn that they would support the Constitution of the United States, and I take it nobody will dispute that an oath to support the Constitution of the United States binds the conscience of every man who takes it to support every constitutional law of the United States, which becomes a part of it. They thought, and so they acted, that this act of 1789 had received its own construction by the very body that passed it, and that was that it was that directory provision for the convenient and orderly administration of the Government, which the two Houses of Congress were expected to follow, unless the absence of the convenient means of following it would put them back upon their own inherent powers. I need not tell my honorable friend from Ohio, and I need not read to him the authority to show it, that by the ancient constitution of all parliamentary bodies the power to administer oaths respecting their own proceedings (I limit it to that, of course) is inherent, and part of their power and existence as a body. And so on this occasion those gentlemen were sworn in.

Why should not these gentlemen therefore be sworn in now? Do you say the statute forbids it? I deny it. Do you say it is not according to the course of precedent? I deny it, for whenever it has been proposed it has always been done. And I do not believe that if there were not some question ulterior to this mere one a single Senator would lift up his voice to say no to the proposition that these gentlemen should be now sworn in, for who would doubt the power of the Senate to direct under existing circumstances that any Senator, the oldest preferably as a matter of courtesy, should administer the oath? I should be glad to hear from my learned friend from Ohio, who I must suppose has some controlling reason in his own mind, what this means.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont to the resolution offered by the Senator from Ohio. Is the Senate ready for the question?

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. Chairman, I will not detain the Senate for any length of time in discussing the points presented by the Senator from Vermont, for really I think the question is one that is narrowed down to a very small compass. I will not undertake to make any response to the assertion of the Senator from Vermont that possibly there was some ulterior motive on the part of the Senator from Ohio, or any other Senator, or all the Senators on this side of the house, in proposing the proceeding which we now ask to be adopted. Believing as I do, and believing as the Senators on this side do, that we are simply following the law in this case, we have no apologies to make to the Senator from Vermont or to any other person or body of persons. If we are mistaken in the course that we propose to adopt here, then it is a mistake which both we and the country will regret; but I am satisfied, for one, after a most painful investigation of this matter with a desire to arrive at a proper conclusion, if ever I had a sincere desire on any subject, that we propose to follow the law in this case; and that I will proceed to show.

What, Mr. Chairman, are we here for to-day? What is the purpose of convoking this assembly at this time? What was the object of the Senate being called together and the only object, so far as the country knows and so far as the world knows? It was to place some one between this Government and possible anarchy in case of the death or the taking away by any other means of the present President of the United States, and that is the person of a President pro tempore of the Senate to be elected here now. That was the object of this meeting, and it is for that purpose that this great concourse of people is here to-day, and for no other purpose. We propose, then, at once to discharge the duty that is imposed upon us by the law of the land, moved and incited thereto by the proclamation of the President of the United States.

The Senate is a continuing body. It has members enough whenever it may meet, in legal contemplation, to transact its business; and it is not so much the purpose, it is not so much the intention of the calling of the Senate together to provide a mere temporary President, or President for the time being, as it is to fill up that possible gap which there may be in the administration of this Government. Hence it is a high duty, it is a great duty, that precedes all others in importance, that precedes all others in the law and under the law of the land. It precedes the question of the swearing in of a Senator in this body; it precedes all other questions in this country, according to my judgment, and it is a question that has never before been presented to this country. It is an anomalous occasion that calls us here. We propose decently and in order and according to law, on our interpretation of it, to fill that possible gap at the earliest practicable moment that we can.

Now let us go to the law; and, for one, I never want to be wiser or more virtuous than the law. I am willing always to stand upon that, and if it is a bad law, an inconvenient law, or an unjust one, woe to those who have provided it; our duty is to obey it. The second section of the act of 1789 is:

That at the first session of Congress after every general election of Representatives, the oath or affirmation aforesaid shall be administered by any one member of the House of Representatives to the Speaker; and by him to all the members present, and to the Clerk, previous to entering on any other business; and to the members who shall afterwards appear, previous to taking their seats. The President of the Senate for the time being shall also administer the said oath or affirmation to each Senator who shall hereafter be elected, previous to his taking his seat.

The President of the Senate pro tempore, or "for the time being," is to administer the prescribed oath. No one will contend that the Senate would not have power perhaps to displace that by making some other provision by unanimous consent. The statute I have just read is a part of the law of the land carried into the Revised Statutes of the United States and recognized and solemnly adopted by Rule 63 of the Senate, which is a law to this body. That rule declares:

The oath or affirmation required by the Constitution and prescribed by the act of June 1, 1789—

What oath? The oath to all these officers, to the members of the House and Senators, that oath which the law prescribes shall be administered by the President of the Senate pro tempore— shall be taken in open Senate by each Senator before entering upon his duties.

Thus the Senate has recognized this statute and has prohibited positively the taking of the oath anywhere else than in the open Senate. There is law enough to suit almost any person, I think. There is the statute passed in June, 1789; there is Rule 63 of this body that recognizes that statute and makes a further provision as to where that oath shall be taken.

But is it a matter of fact under the usual parliamentary law, Mr. Chairman, that this is obligatory upon us? I suppose nobody will controvert the position assumed by the Senator from Vermont that this oath can be administered under the arrangement of the body to which these gentlemen come. It can be administered by a Senator here under a resolution unanimously agreed to—be administered by yourself, sir; but is it an inexorable rule; is it a rule without change; is it an unbending rule that this oath must be administered as contended for by the Senator from Vermont? Let us see what the authorities on the subject say. Cushing's Parliamentary Law, pages 106 and 107, says:

The three essential parts of an organization are the qualification of the members, and the choice of the presiding and recording officers. In some of our legislative bodies the speaker or president is first chosen, then the members are qualified, and lastly the clerk or secretary is chosen; in others, the members are first qualified, then the clerk elected, and lastly the presiding officer; and, in others, again, the members being first qualified, the election of the speaker or president precedes that of clerk.

We are left to take either one of these courses under the parliamentary law as we see proper in the order named; but unless we agree on all sides to one of them, where are we remitted? We are remitted back to the act of 1789. For the convenience of the Senate I admit they may by consent adopt a different rule. They may call upon the senior or the junior member of the body; that has suited the convenience of the Senate repeatedly; there is no question about that; but that did not fix a law nor could it fix a law in the teeth and face of the statute of 1789 if any Senator had objected. That proceeding was by unanimous consent, nobody objecting. We frequently, by common or unanimous consent, do things here otherwise than is prescribed by law or rule, and they go forth as legal. But if those things had been questioned by any Senator at the time, they would not have been done. In other words, the fact that we do not adhere to the law on all occasions is no reason why the law should not be enforced and complied with when it is invoked. And so I might concede here for the present that we may by unanimous consent do otherwise than the law requires in our proceedings and for the time make a law for ourselves, yet when that law is asked to be enforced by even one Senator it must be complied with. Our rules require that a bill shall have three readings on three separate days; and yet how often do we see a bill read twice and referred to a committee in one day because no Senator objects?

In the present anomalous condition of affairs here, we choose to stand upon the statute of 1789 in proceeding to the important duty of filling up the possible gap between us and anarchy in this Government.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it is not the question of an accidental majority; it is not the question of exercising a power which we have by accident; that cannot be charged to this side of the House. We saw here last spring two honorable Senators on the other side of the Chamber voluntarily return their high trust from the State of New York to the people who had given it to them. Certainly that was not the fault of our side, nor was it instigated by this side. We sought to take no advantage of it then; everything moved along in its regular course as though this had not occurred. Providence has seen fit to strike down an honored and honorable member on the other side of this Chamber, one who was beloved by us all, and whose loss was sincerely mourned by the country. These are not circumstances that can be charged to this side of the Chamber. We cannot be held up before the country as taking advantage of accidental circumstances. If these events had been brought about by any action, direct or indirect, of this side of the Chamber, I would die in my tracks before I would lend my voice to take advantage of them; and such I believe is the sentiment of every Senator on this side of the Chamber.

Our position is that as the oath of membership must be administered by a President pro tempore of this body, we must elect that officer first, so that there may be some one to swear in the new Senators, and this we offer to do. The requirement of the act of 1789 may by unanimous consent on various occasions to suit the convenience of Senators have been displaced by administering the oath as stated by the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] but we are guilty of no shortcoming when we say that we will follow the law and the law is the proper exponent of our duty. I am always satisfied as long as I can hold myself and my party friends within the portals of the law.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, the question seems to be reduced, then, as it truly should be, to the mere choice of the body. I am gratified to have heard my honorable friend from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND] admit, with the candor that is characteristic of his career, that the Senate has a lawful and constitutional right to direct at this moment that the oath of office shall be administered to the representatives of these two States, and that they therefore would be lawfully and justly entitled to participate in the action of their sister States in choosing a provisional President of the United States. I of course do not speak technically when I say "provisional President," but in the common language of men. I think my friend did say, however, that these events took place on former occasions by unanimous consent; but I am sure he cannot mean that unanimous consent can change the binding obligation of a law. Unanimous consent can change the law of this body, because the unanimous consent makes it another law of the body; but a constitutional act of Congress, I take it, could hardly be changed or dispensed with by the unanimous consent of the Senate.

What I understand him to mean, therefore, is what I stated before, what is clearly the law, that it is within the lawful and constitutional and regular competence of this body now, before it has a President pro tempore, to do as it did in 1853, when this same law was in force and before the election of a President pro tempore, to swear in the Senators entitled to seats in order that the voices of their States may be heard with their sisters in the selection of a presiding officer of this body. To be sure, then, Mr. President, the prize—if we can speak of this vacancy as a prize won in the lottery of assassination—the prize was not the conditional power in a contingency to administer the office of President of the United States; it was the prize of honorable mention, the prize of a duty chiefly consisting of drudgery and work. That was all.

Does my honorable friend mean to say that if the voice of the eight or ten States whose Senators were then sworn in was to have been exercised upon a matter of consequence to their States and to the general welfare they would have been excluded? I should have supposed that the greater the consequence to follow the first act of the Senate in electing a President pro tempore, the greater the importance and the duty of having every State exert its voice and express its opinion upon that question. There is no denying that. And therefore it appears to me, in the course this argument has taken, to resolve itself into this: that while it is admitted to be perfectly competent and right for the Senate of the United States to swear these gentlemen in now, it will not do it because they having been sworn in a question of great importance might be differently decided to what it may be if they are not sworn in! If that be so, sir,—and I regret extremely to be forced by the apparent logic of this situation to believe it—where is our fidelity to the Constitution of our common country, and to the common equality and right of every State in it? If this were to go on, in the change of events in 1883 it may happen that the outgoing Senators will leave here a clear and decided majority of one party—I do not mind which—which clear and decided majority of one party if the incoming Senators were sworn in would be overturned, and it would be largely the other way. If this be a right precedent, why will it not be right then for those who hold over to hold on and accomplish all the acts of legislation that they think are desirable to their ends before they admit their fellow-Senators from other States, and so on, and so on? The fact that there are only three Senators now in the question does not change it. As I said before, it might be thirty-three. Where is your Government then, sir? Why, Mexico or the unhappy republics of South America would be far preferable to this. The Constitution would be the emptiest urn, held in the withered arms of some coming man in this country, with the sacred ashes of its life torn in the winds of party acrimony. I shall not believe it possible, sir, until I see it by a vote of this body, that, admitted as it now is that it is lawful to swear these men at this time, this body will refuse to do it before it proceeds to any other business whatever.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon the motion of the Senator from Vermont to amend the resolution of the Senator from Ohio. Is the Senate ready for the question?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I call for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays have already been ordered.

Mr. ANTHONY. Let the amendment be reported.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be again reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment is to strike out all after the word "Resolved" in the original resolution and insert:

That the credentials of Messrs. Warner Miller and Elbridge G. Lapham, Senators-elect from the State of New York, and of Nelson W. Aldrich, a Senator from the State of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations, elected to fill the vacancy caused by the death of the late Senator Ambrose E. Burnside, having been read, be placed on the files of the Senate, and that the oaths prescribed by the Constitution and laws be administered to said Senators by Mr. HENRY B. ANTHONY, the senior Senator in service.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on this amendment, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MCPHERSON, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with my colleague, [Mr. SEWELL,] who has been unexpectedly called away.

Mr. WALKER, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Colorado, [Mr. HILL.] If he were here he would vote "yea," and I should vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 33, nays 34; as follows:

YEAS—33.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I hope I shall now have the happiness to command the votes of honorable Senators who have voted against the proposition that I have just submitted. Nobody, I believe, has expressed a disposition to exclude these Senators from every deliberation and act of the Senate to which they can be properly admitted, and the objection made to the amendment I had the honor to offer before was that the present acting majority of this body thought proper to follow the law and to have these oaths administered by the President pro tempore of the Senate. As the majority has so thought, I am bound to yield my acquiescence to that course; and in order to accomplish that purpose and at the same time not to stifle the voice of these two States in our deliberations, I move to amend the resolution now pending by adding at the end of it the words "for this day;" so that it will read:

That THOMAS F. BAYARD, a Senator from the State of Delaware, is hereby chosen President pro tempore of the Senate for this day.

That, Mr. President, will fulfill the most extreme Mosaical view of the law. We come up to the statute; we embrace it, and if our object be to follow the law we follow it, and if we have left any reverence for the Constitution in allowing every State lawfully here by its members to speak, we can follow the Constitution too.

My learned and honorable friends might think, perhaps, that this is a novel motion, and that as the Constitution says that the Senate may elect a President pro tempore, he must be elected a President pro tempore simply and purely, neither more nor less, without any limit to the duration of his career other than the will of the Senate. If any man's mind should be discomposed upon such a question, I beg leave to refer to another notable and honorable precedent of a democratic majority of the Senate of the United States in the year 1854. When the Senate met on the 4th day of December of that year there were two Senators-elect who had not been sworn in. That makes it different from this case, because there are three here. I mention that so that anybody who wishes to make a point of it may have the advantage of it. The Senate having been called to order and the fact that the President pro tempore of the Senate was not present having been communicated—

On motion by Mr. Hunter, and by unanimous consent,
Resolved, That the Hon. Lewis Cass be President of the Senate pro tempore for this day.
On motion by Mr. Broadhead,
Ordered, That the Secretary inform the House of Representatives, &c.

That being done, then—

Mr. Foot presented the credentials of Hon. Lawrence Brainerd, chosen a Senator by the General Assembly of the State of Vermont to fill the vacancy occasione by the death of Hon. William Upham; which were read, and the oath prescribed by law was administered to Mr. Brainerd, and he took his seat in the Senate.

And I think there was another Senator sworn in, but I will not take the trouble to look; I said two a moment ago, but that is of no consequence. And I believe, Mr. President, that only a session or two ago, while the late Senator from Ohio, Mr. Thurman, was occupying the office of President pro tempore of this body and was unable to be present on one occasion and, therefore, his office legally would fall and a new presiding officer would be elected, it was moved that Hon. Mr. Eaton (if I recollect the Senator aright) be made President pro tempore for that day, and that was done. Indeed I need not take time, I think, to discuss a proposition so plain.

I repeat, we can have a President pro tempore for this day and for this occasion. We can follow the law and call or rather admit to their just seats in the deliberations of this body the representatives of two States, and then proceed to-morrow to determine who shall be President pro tempore for that day or any other. Unless, I repeat, we desire to prevent those States from taking part in an important act belonging to this body we can permit them to exert their lawful rights conformably to the Constitution, conformably to the letter of the law which my learned friend from Arkansas desires to follow, conformably to the gracious precedents of democratic Senates. Will we do it? Let us see.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, I desire to say that the law of 1789 and the rules of this Senate require that a President pro tempore be elected by the Senate prior to the swearing in of new members, and that the oath shall be administered by him to them in the open Senate. That it is proposed to do; no more, no less.

Why the President pro tempore should be elected for this day and then have another election again, when the occupancy of the chair by the President pro tempore of the Senate is always in the power of the Senate and in the power of a majority of the Senate, I am not quite able to comprehend. I am always afraid of mischief from modifying resolutions of this character. I have seen very modest words accomplish great results when they were said to be very innocent at the time they were inserted. I remember the "if any" of the Electoral Commission law that cut a tremendous figure in that great fraud and deprived several States of their rights in that electoral count within a very recent period. When we stand by the law as it is, and leave the whole question hereafter in the power of the majority of the Senate, there can be no wrong done to anybody. As was well suggested by the Senator from Arkansas, if the present President of the United States, then the President of the Senate, at the last session of this body had followed the precedents which had been usual and almost universal before, and allowed this Senate to elect a President pro tempore, there would have been no necessity for his convening us in session now. When the Senators from New York saw fit to resign, I suppose he did not vacate his seat and give the Senate a chance to elect its own President pro tempore for some reason satisfactory to himself and to his party friends, and hence we are called together.

Now we propose to stand by the law and by that alone, and not to accept any modification such as is now proposed. Nobody denies that unanimous consent can do almost anything here. The simple thing is that we do not propose to give unanimous consent to any proposition except to carry out the law of the land. Men can be sworn in otherwise; unanimous consent can do nearly anything in the Senate; and we are taunted with seeking to do indecent things because we do not give unanimous consent to propositions made in contravention of the law of the land.

That is all there is of the case, and I think this side of the Chamber do not propose to give unanimous consent to anything, except in an orderly way to execute the law as it stands upon the statute-book. If that law is a bad one, change it.

I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment now offered.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. Chairman, one word. According to my version of the law, while the Senate has the power to do what the Senator from Vermont suggests in his amendment, it is entirely unnecessary to do so because the tenure of office of the President pro tempore has been distinctly defined by a resolution of this body which I believe now receives the approbation of every person—a resolution adopted January 12, 1876, in these words:

Resolved, That the office of President pro tempore is held at the pleasure of the Senate.

So that after Mr. BAYARD shall have been elected President of the Senate pro tempore a majority may any day elect somebody else so that he can return thanks and retire. That is already the tenure of office, as everybody understands, and it would be just exactly like incorporating this construction in the resolution expecting the Senator from Delaware to follow it up by saying that he holds his office at the pleasure of the Senate. That is the legal interpretation of the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont, so that it calls upon us to do an entirely unnecessary thing.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I beg to assure my distinguished friend from Kentucky that no gentleman on this side has asked unanimous consent to do anything. We have so far, those of us who merely by grace apparently continue to occupy seats—for the majority of this body might if it found sufficient motive for it (I do not know how great and extensive that motive would be) could by a simple resolution declare that our credentials were invalid and out we should go; that does not appear to have been thought necessary yet,—we have not asked unanimous consent for anything. But we who, by grace, or law, or whatever, are yet entitled to represent our States in this body, are endeavoring to understand, and are endeavoring, I confess, to have the people of the United States understand, upon what ground it is that two States whose relations to the Union and to this body are unquestioned, that three Senators whose credentials are unassailed, now on your table and standing here ready to be sworn, shall not be. That is what we intend shall be understood, and in doing that we ask no consent. We follow the law, we follow democratic precedent, which down to this time whenever it has been desired either for convenience or for right has sworn in Senators of both parties before it proceeded to the election of an indefinite President pro tempore. If it be thought that some patriotic impulse inspires you to reverse that and to accomplish what you know cannot be accomplished without the exclusion of these States, do it.

There is an ancient saying that has proved true forever that they who take the sword will perish by it; and I think if we believe at all in free institutions with orderly government, (and I do,) that they who by methods and by will achieve advantages by the exclusion of their equals from the conference out of which they are to come will reap bitter fruit in the end.

I think that whatever fruit is gained from that will be ashes of the bitterest description. But that is for the future. For the present it is our mission to appeal to you Senators by the precedents of your own party, by the conduct of your own honorable predecessors, by the spirit and the letter of the Constitution, in this way that does comply with the law in every particular, letter and spirit, to give your sister States the right that you are to exercise yourselves of choosing the presiding officer of this body.

My learned friend from Arkansas says, "Why, you can turn him out to-morrow." True; but why do we shut our eyes, when the eyes of all the world are open elsewhere, to the fact that apparently, probably it may be, you are to achieve this thing and put it out of the power of these Senators whom you deny a voice now to overturn your resolution? That is what it is. It is somewhat bare, therefore, of reason to say, "Exclude these gentlemen now because having come in they can participate in the rectification of the error, if it be an error that we are now to commit by electing the wrong gentleman President of the Senate." No, Mr. President, it stands upon that deeper, broader ground that if by any possible expedient of this body it can be avoided, no State, great or small, is to be excluded from the first as well as the last act that this body is to do, whether it be trifling or whether it be important, for among equals all are equal, and if the voice of equals is to be heard the voice of all the equals is to be heard at the same time if it can be done consistently with law. You admit that it can be done consistently with law; you admit that this present proposition follows the very statute upon which you stand. Why will you not do it? Do you think that Lewis Cass and James Shields and David R. Atchison and that great array of names appearing in the Journal of 1854 committed a mistake when they provided that there should be a President pro tempore for one day in order that the new Senators to come in (as I must suppose) should be sworn and then participate on the next day in the choice of a President pro tempore to hold indefinitely at the will of the Senate? Do you think that they mistook the meaning of the Constitution and that just regard for the rights of their equals to speak as well as they? It may be that you do. I must suppose that you think so, and that the shades of Cass and Shields and all the others are roaming uneasily in whatever departed good land they may be, as they now hear, as we may hope, our deliberations, at the mistake they had committed which their wiser children are about to avoid. There used to be an old phrase, Mr. President, but I believe that, like the methods of the fathers, like the practice of Cass and his associates, has gone by, and our modern shame, if such a thing exist, has lost her blush and that it has come to be a fixed purpose of any temporary and accidental power in this body growing out of the constant changes of Senators by expiration of terms or death or resignation to exclude their fellows and their equals until they can grasp something that if their fellows and equals were present they could not grasp. Well, as I say, sir, the future will rectify it if it be done.

O Shame, where is thy blush?

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, notwithstanding the great misfortunes that have befallen the Senate and the country, we still have something left upon which to congratulate ourselves; and that is the exhibition in the Senate this morning of the fact that the Senator from Vermont, after having by his vote and voice frequently participated in excluding sovereign States from a voice in this Senate, has at last come to the conclusion that they must be admitted whenever the credentials of Senators are presented, without investigation and without inquiry even on the part of the Senate or of Senators. The country is evidently progressing towards a better condition, towards a state of relief from that very stringent rule which has been applied so frequently to members of the Senate on this side of the Chamber by which they were compelled, though having full and lawful credentials, to stand knocking at the door of the Senate for days and weeks and months and years, barred out by the vote of the Senator merely because he desired to have inquiry made before our credentials were permitted to have their full legal weight in this body. The examples stand around me so thick to-day of the injustice inflicted upon States of the American Union by this course of procedure, that it would seem almost unnecessary that I should mention the names of States that have been deprived of their suffrage in this body.

Here is the State of South Carolina that was kept out for months and years. The State of Louisiana was disbarred her right to come into the Senate of the United States upon proper and lawful credentials. The State of Mississippi was compelled to stand here when the honorable Senator who now occupies the seat in my rear [Mr. LAMAR] brought lawful credentials from a lawful Legislature, presented them to this body, and without reasonable excuse he was delayed in his admission for two days. The State of Alabama in the person of the Senator who now addresses the body was in like manner excluded. And never did the Senator from Vermont rise upon the floor to demand that these Senators should have their right to a voice and their "suffrage" according to the language of the Constitution in this body.

Pending these exclusions from the Senate the gravest matters of public interest were enacted by this body; you entered into legislative sessions; you pursued the even tenor of your way in imposing laws upon our States to which the people were bound to yield obedience, and yet you silenced the suffrage of Alabama and Mississippi and South Carolina and Louisiana in this body without remorse and without the slightest appearance of sympathy or of feeling. You entered into executive session and confirmed nominations, often of men who exercised the functions of their offices within these several States, and yet no voice was raised even to intimate that these States were the equals of other States in this Union and should be admitted to their suffrage in this body. Now there appears to be a purpose sufficiently urgent to animate the honorable Senator from Vermont to a very earnest advocacy of the doctrine we then contended for, and which we yet admit to be just and true. Not content, however, with an urgent and vehement presentation of this doctrine, the honorable Senator from Vermont even taunts this side of the Chamber because we are not willing to abdicate a solemn and sworn duty to obey the laws and Constitution of this country in the organization of this august body. There seems to be in the contemplation of the Senator some great crime which we are about to perpetrate, because we follow the mandate of the laws.

Let us inquire, Mr. Chairman—suppose it had turned out that the Senate of the United States had by the Constitution the duty devolved upon it in last February of the election of a Vice-President of the United States, in case the electoral college had failed to make a choice, who would become President of the United States in the event of no election by the House. At the time of the count of the electoral votes there was a majority I believe of seven democrats in this body. Suppose that this duty had been devolved upon the Senate when we had seven majority, would any man have expected the democratic party in this body to have elected a republican to that office? Why surely the world would have considered that we had abdicated the most solemn duty that rested upon us with reference to our relations to the States and people that sent us to this body. Precisely in that very light does the question stand to-day. Here we are by law, and not by our act, placed in a majority of this body, and is it expected of us that, representing the States that sent us here, we shall do otherwise than we would have done last February when our majority was seven members in this body? The parallel is so plain in reference to the obligations of our duty that it seems to be impossible to disregard the conclusions to which it leads.

A State of this Union by the act of both its Senators retired from this body during the last called session. That State, so far as the Senators could affect its relations to the Senate of the United States, seceded from this body. They were not provoked to that by any conduct on the part of the democrats in the Senate. It was their own act of voluntary imprudence or impropriety. We had then no responsibility resting upon us, and we have none now, for the withdrawal of the State of New York from this body.

Then it was our right and it was our duty, if the opportunity had been allowed us, to have selected a President pro tempore of the Senate who, according to all the laws and rules governing in such cases, would have entered on the duties and functions of his office without the necessity of this second called session of the Senate. What has made it necessary that the President of the United States should assemble this Senate to-day in extraordinary session? Nothing but the fact that that same gentleman while occupying the office of Vice-President and presiding in the Senate chose not to follow the almost unbroken traditions of this body in withdrawing from it and allowing a President pro tempore to be elected. He was sustained in that course of conduct, doubtless, by his party. Then it was apprehended, I dare say, as it is now, that we would elect a distinguished and worthy democrat to fill that office, and we would have voted on that occasion to elect a democrat, and would have been bound in honor as democrats to have done so, as was conceded virtually by the fact that the Vice-President declined to yield the chair according to the custom and allow us to elect. So to-day finding ourselves here with a majority capable of electing a President of the Senate, it seems to me to be an interference in the freedom of our will for Senators on the other side to demand that we should yield the power which they have thus placed in our hands and allow them to elect a republican President of the Senate.

That is the situation now, so far as the facts are concerned. This body met here this morning, and is now in session in what capacity? Not as an organized Senate; I scarcely know how to designate it, but perhaps the idea of a grand committee is the most appropriate with which to signify or to express the view that I entertain of the present condition of this body. Convoked by the President of the United States, Senators met here, and by unanimous consent the honorable Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] called the body to order; he now occupies the chair, and we are proceeding with the necessary legal steps to organize a legal, constitutional Senate. The Senators are here; motions and resolutions are pending, and we are discussing them under this consent with the view to the organization of a lawful, constitutional Senate. We could not at this moment of time, for instance, send a message to the President of the United States that the Senate is organized and ready to receive from him any communication he might choose to send to us, the reason being that we are not yet a Senate. Then comes the law of the land, enacted in the very beginning of the Government, which prescribes that the President of the Senate shall administer the oath of office to Senators, and then comes the rule of the Senate which prescribes that in addition thereto this oath shall be administered in the open Senate, and by the President of the Senate. Now, we are endeavoring to follow this law and this rule so as to execute the law in obedience to what we conceive to be our sworn duty as Senators.

As to where the choice shall fall, that is a matter of little consequence compared with the great duty that is devolved upon us by the Constitution and laws of this country. We are now proceeding to execute that law, and the honorable Senator from Vermont arises and reads a precedent, and he invites us by following that precedent to abandon our duty under the law. He cites us to the fact that some of the most eminent democrats in the country on one occasion felt themselves at liberty in their own consciences to abdicate a duty under the law. The ready reply to that is that the more steadily and uniformly and consistently we observe the laws of the land the better and higher example we set to the people and all other departments of this Government, and we can find no excuse in following a precedent which Senators must logically concede is contrary to and in violation of law. That is enough for us; it surely is enough for me. My conduct will be governed and guided strictly by that consideration.

The honorable Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND] perhaps might have conceded—I believe he did not intend to do so—that by unanimous consent the Senate of the United States could prescribe a method of admission to this body which would not be in conformity to the statute law. I would not go so far; I do not think that is a proper interpretation of the law or the Constitution nor of our duties under them. The rule of law prescribed in the statute of 1789 and in the sixty-third rule of the Senate relates not to the "qualifications" of a Senator, but it relates to the method of his induction into office. The qualifications of a Senator are prescribed by the Constitution of the United States, and a man who comes within the range of those qualifications so as to fulfill them is a Senator whenever he is inducted into his office in the manner prescribed by law, and not before. The qualifications of the President and Vice-President of the United States are also prescribed by the Constitution, but no man can be considered as otherwise than a mere de facto officer, he surely cannot be considered a de jure officer, until he has taken the oath prescribed by the Constitution of the United States and has thereby been inducted into the office. The Congress of the United States, exercising a power its right to exercise which has never been disputed, has prescribed the law and the Senate has prescribed the rule to which allusion has been made several times this morning. Now, we must obey that law and obey that rule, or else disobey them. That law and that rule do not fix the qualifications of Senators, as to which a great deal is left to the judgment of the Senate; but they do fix a method of induction into office which cannot be disregarded.

I will suppose that lacking one qualification, once required by a statute of the United States to be expressly stated in what is called the iron-clad oath, I had been elected to the Senate of the United States, and I had chosen to take some other form of oath than that, and before a magistrate outside the walls of this Chamber and not in the presence of the Senate, and I had come in here with my credentials and a certified copy of that oath and had demanded admittance to this body: it could not be argued that the Senate of the United States could have admitted me to a seat in this body under those circumstances without violating the law of the land, without nullifying the law enacted by Congress and approved by the President of the United States.

What composes a quorum of the Senate of the United States? Senators on the other side of the Chamber found themselves compelled a few years back, in order to account constitutionally and legally for the absence of many excluded States, my own among the number—eleven I believe it was at the time were excluded—to adopt this rule, the first rule in the book:

> The presiding officer having taken the chair, and a quorum (which shall consist of a majority of the Senators duly chosen and sworn) being present, the Journal of the preceding day shall then be read, and any mistake made in the entries may be corrected.

There in prescribing what was a quorum of the Senate you adopted a rule that it should be a majority of those Senators who had been duly chosen and sworn, and in another rule you prescribed the manner in which they should be sworn. Both by rule and by statute has that particular duty been especially guarded. Why has the Congress of the United States and the Senate of the United States given so much attention to a matter which may be frittered away by a bare majority vote of the Senate alone whenever it sees proper to do it? Why has the Congress of the United States prescribed the form of oath and prescribed the manner of its being given and the officer by whom it shall be given and the place at which it should be given, if all this is to stand subject to the mere caprice of the Senate which by a majority may set aside the rule and repeal the law at the same time and admit a man contrary to the rule and contrary to the law? I can scarcely suppose that so much time and care was wasted on a subject of this kind.

The honorable Senator from Vermont said that he had not heard it stated or even intimated that any Senator on this side of the Chamber had any substantial objection to the admission of the Senator from Rhode Island and the two Senators from New York. It is not for me to say whether such substantial objections exist or not; but quoting, not literally, but according to the general tenor of what has been said, from the great leading republican journals of the State of New York, it might well be supposed that Senators on this side of the Chamber would desire at least a brief moment of examination before they concluded to take Senators from a Legislature one member of which stands indicted for bribing another in reference to the election of a Senator, and which attained to such ignoble reputation among the leading republican journals of the State of New York as that it became the subject of reproach throughout the whole civilized world as to the corruption which stained that body. Perhaps we shall be pardoned even in this great exigency, for which we are not responsible and which has compelled the calling of this Senate together, if we should lend an attentive ear to the complaints that have been made by the republican party against the conduct of a republican Legislature in New York. But the Senator from Vermont would crowd these credentials upon us and have these Senators admitted even when constitutional questions are urged in reference to the fact of their lawful election to this body. Why is this done unless the Senator desires to escape from the investigation which it may be necessary to institute and conduct, and to find a summary remedy for the evils and difficulties which have been brought upon the country solely by the action of the party which he leads so splendidly here?

I repeat, sir, we are not responsible for this called session of this body. I repeat, sir, that if Mr. Arthur had retired from that chair during the last extra session and after the Senators from New York had withdrawn, the country would not have been disturbed and burdened with the necessity of having this body called together now; and as to all of this anxiety and fear of whatever may follow, our garments are clean. You of the republican party are responsible for it.

Mr. BECK. Will the Senator from Alabama allow me a moment?

Mr. MORGAN. I will.

Mr. BECK. I wish to say one word, Mr. President, having the record now before me. Some stress seems to be now laid on the fact that we are exercising power when a republican President is dead and a republican Vice-President has been called upon to fill his office; and it is said to be anomalous that in such a state of affairs we should seek to elect a democrat as President pro tempore of the Senate. The record shows that on the 9th day of July, 1850, General Taylor, who was elected as a whig by over 140,000 popular majority, died and Millard Filmore became President of the United States the same day. On the 11th of July, on motion of Mr. Dickinson, of New York, William R. King, of Alabama, a democratic Senator, was elected President pro tempore and held until another democratic President pro tempore was elected, so that where the death of a whig President occurred and the Vice-President assumed his place, the Senate having a democratic majority filled its chair, as we propose to fill it now, by a democratic President pro tempore.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will the Senator from Alabama allow me a moment?

Mr. MORGAN. Certainly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I thank my friend from Alabama for his courtesy. Will the Senator from Kentucky be kind enough to tell us whether on that occasion, the real division of parties being equal, the party that happened to have a technical majority on the morning of that day refused to admit three Senators with regular credentials in order to accomplish their purpose of electing Mr. King?

Mr. BECK. I will answer that. The democratic party has a majority to-day, not accidental, except as caused by the wrongful conduct of the then Vice-President in failing to vacate his seat, and the foolish conduct of two Senators from New York in throwing up their credentials. [Applause in the galleries.] The legitimate majority caused by these follies proposes to execute the law.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kentucky will suspend. The Chair takes occasion to warn the galleries that if there is another exhibition of approval or disapproval from them the Chair will take the responsibility of ordering the galleries to be cleared. The Senator from Kentucky will proceed.

Mr. BECK. Only one other word. Having that majority, as I said, the fact that the President is dead and that the Vice-President is now acting as such makes it precisely a parallel case to what occurred in 1850. When General Taylor died then Millard Fillmore became President, and the democrats having a majority then, as we have it now, elected William R. King, of Alabama, President pro tempore, not for an hour, nor for a day, but President pro tempore, subject to the will of the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I have the permission of my friend from Alabama to say a word?

Mr. MORGAN. Certainly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am not surprised at the manifestation of the galleries. It adds a certainly graceful keeping to the drama that goes on. To be sure, it is contrary to the rules of the Senate; but it is true that the rules of the Senate, its standing orders, require the Sergeant-at-Arms to arrest such persons and bring them before the Senate for punishment. But if the Senator says that two States in this Union are now, and I do not know but forever hereafter, to be excluded from representation because the Vice-President of the United States in the opinion of that Senator has failed to do something that he ought to have done, or because some former Senators from the State of New York have resigned when they ought not to have resigned, it is not strange to me, as it sometimes happened I believe in the Roman forum when causes of justice were being decided, that the populace should add their constitutional views to such an occasion and such an argument.

But are we to be told, sir, seriously that any want of proper conduct—and I am far from believing there was any although I know nothing about it, having been ill and absent at the time—in the Vice-President of the United States, or supposing that the Senators from the State of New York betrayed their trust—and I have no right or authority or wish to express any opinion upon the subject; they certainly did not betray it for they had a right to surrender it; or suppose they did anything that was unfair and not right, is that a reason why the people of the great State of New York and under the Constitution the equally great State of Rhode Island, who fail to be represented for a different cause, are to be punished for that, and now when we have met as we are and their newly chosen representatives are here that you are to refuse to allow them to participate in our proceedings? My friend's case would have been a precedent, a bad one it is true, but it would have been a precedent if on that occasion to which he refers three Senators' credentials had been presented and the ruling majority had refused to allow them to be sworn until those who were in should have chosen a President pro tempore whom they hoped when the others did come in could not be ousted from his office. Then it would have been a case in point, not now.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I deny that this side of the Chamber have refused to admit Senators from New York or the Senator from Rhode Island said to be elected to this body. That subject has not been considered. If they have been denied admission into this body now, it is because the body is not in legal position to admit them. The officer prescribed by the law and the rule of the Senate is not yet in existence who has authority to admit them into office by administering to them the required oath of office. We follow the law and support and sustain it in its refusal to admit these gentlemen as members of this body until they can come in regularly as all other members of this body are required to do, and as, doubtless, the good of the country requires that they should do. Otherwise we should not find, as I have before observed, such stringent guards in the statutes and in the rules of the Senate restricting their induction into office. That is the fair statement of the situation so far as they are concerned.

I might retort upon the honorable Senator and say to him that he exhibits remarkable anxiety, and I think very great haste, in undertaking to sweep from the statute-book laws that are binding upon us, and from the rules of the Senate rules which have been acted upon for many years here, in order that he may have some support in doing what? As far as I know, in bringing the Senate again into a disgraceful deadlock. Perhaps it might turn out otherwise; I venture no prediction upon that subject; but for nearly two months of this year we have found the Senate of the United States with equally divided parties unable to execute any of the business of the country because of such condition.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will the Senator allow me to ask him why it was unable?

Mr. MORGAN. I think it was because the Senator from Vermont or those with whom he is acting, having first made an arrangement with a Senator elected as a democrat and for the election of somebody to the minor offices of the Senate, concluded that it was the duty of the republican party on that side by any means, whether sustained by law or morals it made no difference, to break down the party on this side and build up the party on that. That is my conviction about it. The Senator asks for an opinion.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator will allow me to say that, according to the best of my knowledge, information, and belief, he is mistaken first as to his fact, as to any arrangement whatever. Second, if he will allow me to say it in his time, through his kindness, he is mistaken as to his second proposition that a deadlock was occasioned. The fact that the Senate failed to pass a particular resolution, which was a lawful and orderly one, grew out of the circumstance that a body of Senators in this Chamber—and ten could have done it as well as thirty-seven—obstructed and prevented the Senate from coming to any vote upon it, as any Senators can do on this now from this time until December.

Mr. MORGAN. Educated to that particular science of tactics and strategy by some ten or twelve days of obstruction in which the Senator from Vermont—not he, but his party in the Senate—led the way.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think the Senator is again mistaken.

Mr. MORGAN. They set up a pretense of high moral, political, and constitutional duty for obstructing the proceedings of the Senate until men could be elected by Legislatures or appointed by governors, in order to fill up the Senate and create a majority of this body. Perhaps we might say that "honors were easy" on that occasion so far as the practice of the two parties in the Senate was concerned. The honorable Senator asked me why I had come to certain conclusions or made certain statements here, and in answer to that I stated my own convictions on the subject drawn from the facts as they presented themselves to my mind. Perhaps I am wrong; I hope that I am, but I do not believe it.

Now, Mr. President, I say that I could retort upon the honorable Senator from Vermont that he is pushing us to conclusions with extraordinary rapidity, not only at the expense of the law of the land and the rules of the Senate, but, as we fear very much, at the expense of real substantial justice to this body and to the country. These credentials have only been read this morning, and there is perhaps not a Senator here who has retained in his mind a thorough understanding of what they certify to. I dare say that the eye of a democratic Senator has never rested upon the papers which have been presented. Certainly no opportunity of investigation whatever has been accorded to us. It has been intimated that not only frauds prevailed in the Legislature of New York, but it also has been strongly intimated and urged that there was a want of constitutional power in that Legislature under the Constitution of the United States and of the State of New York to elect these Senators at the time they were elected. Are we to have no moment of time for the consideration of these grave questions, and are we to admit Senators here when, perchance, it may afterwards turn out that we violate the Constitution in admitting them, because they were not elected by bodies having authority to elect? Let us take matters a little more quietly, a little more sedately; let us observe the law of the land in the method of organizing this body, and we shall give to ourselves and to the country far more satisfaction than we should if from any motive, it makes no difference how good it might be, we should undertake to treat the laws on the statute-book with disdainful and contemptuous scorn upon the idea that they were interrupting the Senate in the discharge of its duty.

One more word, Mr. Chairman. The amendment which is now pending proposes to limit the tenure of office of the President pro tempore to one day, to this day. If we have a right to prescribe that tenure by a resolution of the Senate to the office of President pro tempore of this body, we have an equal right to prescribe a year. Whenever you assume to yourselves the right and power to prescribe the tenure of that office you thereby assume the right to forestall the Senate in setting aside or disregarding the tenure which you have established by your resolution, so that it must follow legitimately and legally that if we can say that the President pro tempore to be elected shall be chosen only for a day we should have an equal right to say he should be chosen only for an hour, and an equal right to say that he should be chosen for a year, or during the whole presidential term of Mr. Arthur. And yet here stands the action of the Senate of the United States matured in its wisdom, and I believe taken from a report of a committee, the chairman of which was Hon. Oliver P. Morton, in which it was solemnly decided—the honorable Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND] read the resolution—that the office of President pro tempore of the Senate is always under the control of this body. Now, sir, when we have adopted this resolution suppose this session lasts until midnight.

Mr. VEST. I think it was the Senator from Vermont who reported that resolution.

Mr. MORGAN. If so, the argument would be only the stronger.

Mr. EDMUNDS. My friend is mistaken. I think that resolution was reported from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, of which I was never a member to the best of my knowledge and belief.

Mr. MORGAN. That was my impression.

Mr. VEST. I think it came from the Judiciary Committee, of which the Senator was chairman.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. Morton was never a member of the Judiciary Committee in my time.

Mr. VEST. It was a resolution of the Senator from Vermont, I think.

Mr. MORGAN. That resolution is just as thoroughly the law of this Senate as any resolution ever adopted.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There is no doubt of its correctness. It is perfectly clear.

Mr. MORGAN. And it subjects the office of President pro tempore of the Senate to the will and pleasure of the Senate at all times without exception. If, then, we prescribe that the President of the Senate pro tempore to be elected to-day shall be elected only for this day, it must follow, as a matter of course, that, after that resolution has been adopted and has passed beyond the period of reconsideration, it must stand as the law of the Senate until it is repealed by some other resolution. So that the Senate of the United States is now called upon to violate its own solemn declaration, its own traditional policy, its own avowal of its right under the Constitution, and for this special occasion to limit itself to a particular line of action and the office of President pro tempore to a certain fixed tenure. The Senator from Vermont might do as has been heretofore done on one occasion, offer a resolution that the President pro tempore of the Senate shall be elected and take his seat for the purpose only of qualifying Senators, by administering the oath to them. Perhaps the Senator from Vermont may yet come forward with an amendment of that kind. I do not know how far his genius and enterprise may lead him in arranging propositions for the purpose of defeating the law of the land and the rules of the Senate as they are laid down and prescribed in the book.

But we should have just as much right to say that the President pro tempore of the Senate should be chosen for the sole purpose of swearing in the Senators from New York and Rhode Island as we should have to say that he should be elected only for to-day. Suppose that after we had elected him for to-day the President of the United States should become disabled for the discharge of his duties, what would then be the condition of affairs? Perhaps, without the will of the three Senators who are not yet admitted, the gentleman whom we might select would become instantly the acting President of the United States, and that beyond the power of the Senate to undo him, because they had elected him for to-day and that means under the Constitution, as I construe it, for the full time until a President of the United States is elected or until the disability is removed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is not the law.

Mr. MORGAN. That is my view of the law in reference to the devolution of the office or the duties of the office of President of the United States upon the President pro tempore of the Senate.

Mr. Chairman, I would gladly yield to the other side of this Chamber the responsibility of what they now so urgently and so earnestly demand; I would gladly yield it, looking to the interests of the democratic party, and looking to the gratification of my own feelings; but, sir, we are here for the purpose of executing the laws of this land, and I do not understand that I have any authority otherwise than by the regular course of legislative proceedings to repeal and to nullify or annul those laws. While they stand on the statute-book they must be followed by me.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, I have no disposition to enter into a partisan discussion at any time, and especially at a time like the present. Certainly the question before us, however, presented by the Senator from Vermont, is one on which I think there need be very little debate. When that Senator uses the expression that the democratic party now seeks to take advantage of assassination I conceive it unworthy a discussion of this kind. I might say to that Senator that the blow which struck down the late President of the United States had no aspiration in it for democratic success, but it was for a faction of the republican party. If there be responsibility, direct or indirect, it rests there and not on us. I charge it not, but I repeat that the intimation, the suspicion that the democracy of this country have anything else but tears to shed for that terrible event, and anything but execration for that miserable offender, is utterly unfounded and cruelly unjust.

But, Mr. President, we are told now, as the shadows of the immortal dead are invoked, that the democratic party seeks to exclude from the deliberations of this Hall two sovereign States of this Union without law and without excuse. I might again retort, when did the republican party learn to confine themselves within the letter of the law where partisan advantage was sought to be obtained? But, sir, I am willing to stand in the presence of the immortal dead and try this question. The Senator from Vermont has invoked the shade of my illustrious predecessor upon this floor, that gallant man who illustrated his valor and his fidelity to the American flag on many a bloody battle-field—James Shields. I stand here and make my argument before his spirit and the other illustrious dead who are now with him in the land of shadows.

On the congressional records of this country are nine instances parallel with the case now before the Senate. I say now to the Senator from Vermont, and I challenge contradiction, that in some of these instances Senators from sovereign States were compelled to stand outside of this Chamber while a President pro tempore was elected in order to administer to them the oath. I challenge contradiction from the whole republican press of this country and the representatives of the republican party upon this floor when I state that it is shown by the records of the country that seven times out of nine the Senators here by an overwhelming majority decided that the new Senators before being sworn in should stand aside until a President pro tempore of this body was elected in order to administer to them the oath of office.

Mr. EDMUNDS. As my honorable friend challenges contradiction will he yield to me to make it?

Mr. VEST. Certainly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then I do contradict it, and I say there is no instance in the history of the country in which any Senator-elect has been compelled to stand aside, as his phrase was, until a President pro tempore was elected. There is no instance until this one to-day in which when it was proposed to swear in the new Senators before a President pro tempore was elected, it was not done.

Mr. VEST. With all respect to the Senator from Vermont, that is an evasion of the question and of my argument. When Clay, Calhoun, Webster, and Benton stood upon this floor and saw fourteen new Senators waiting at that door to be sworn in, and determined that they should not enter until a President pro tempore was elected, does the Senator pretend to say that they thought sovereign States were being excluded from their privileges upon this floor?

Mr. EDMUNDS. But, may I ask my friend, if he will allow me——

Mr. VEST. Certainly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Did they determine that they should stand aside until then? Did a single Senator propose that they should be sworn in? Did they ask it themselves?

Mr. VEST. They did determine it by the most solemn official action, under their oaths of office.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will the Senator kindly refer us to the instance?

Mr. VEST. I will, with pleasure, sir. Upon November 5, 1792, a President pro tempore was elected before new Senators were sworn in. Upon March 4, 1841, fourteen new Senators stood outside of this Chamber until a President pro tempore was elected. Upon March 5, 1849, the same thing occurred; and upon March 4, 1857; upon March 4, 1863; upon March 5, 1877; upon March 4, 1837; and in only two instances in the history of this country has the oath of office ever been administered to new Senators by a Senator upon this floor instead of a President pro tempore.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If the Senator will permit me——

Mr. VEST. Certainly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator is perfectly correct in his history, but his statement, as it appears to me, with great respect, differed a little from the history. He said it was determined that they should not be sworn in until a President pro tempore was elected. I differ with him. No question was raised, no application was made, and, I repeat, in the two instances that he names which are the only ones that exist where any Senator proposed that that should be done, inasmuch as parties stood so that it would make no difference, it was done.

Mr. VEST. Yet the Senator from Vermont assumes that Clay, Calhoun, Webster, Benton, Shields, Collamer, the great constitutional lawyers of that day, the defenders of popular rights and the sovereignty of States, were ignorant of the rights of Senators and the laws of the land. Sir, I deny it in defense of the memory of these great men. I say no man raised the question until 1853. The act of Congress was passed June 1, 1789; and the precedents are unbroken down to 1853; and I make the statement now in regard to that case to relieve the conscience of the Senator from Vermont. On December 20, 1852, David R. Atchison, of the State of Missouri, was elected President pro tempore of the Senate in place of William R. King, the President pro tempore at that time of the Senate, who resigned and went to Cuba on account of ill-health. At the succeeding session of the Senate in March, 1853, the question was mooted whether Mr. Atchison continued to be President pro tempore of the Senate, that session having expired, or whether he was out of office by virtue of the expiration of the session. Some of the best lawyers then upon this floor and in the Union held to the opinion, as the Senator from Vermont very well knows, that with the expiration of the session the incumbent of the office of President pro tempore went out of office. Mr. Atchison, in view of this extraordinary contingency and this novel question, submitted, as he should have done in all delicacy and fairness, the question to his brother Senators. I know from information derived from him (for in the providence of God he is yet an honored citizen of the State of Missouri) that his motive was in delicacy and fairness to ascertain beyond any question what the real legal status of the case was at that time. A compromise was the result, a compromise by which it was determined, by general and universal consent, that the oldest Senator should swear in the new Senators. That is the whole of it, and that is the instance which the Senator from Vermont invokes here to-day to break down the law of Congress, the rule of the Senate, and the unbroken precedents of this country since 1792.

Sir, we can afford to submit any such case to the people of these United States. We can afford to go to the country and let them say whether the democratic party seeks arbitrarily to wrest power and to rob sovereign States of their equal rights under the Constitution.

Mr. President, if the democratic party were the party of vandals and robbers described on this floor, where would be the majority of the Senate to-day? Where would be the power accidentally now in the hands of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MAHONE] if eight democrats upon this side of the Chamber had not been actuated by their own conscientious convictions against partisan policy, against spoils, against plunder, when they had beyond question the undisputed majority on this floor? Yet in the very teeth of that action of the democrats, when we had eight majority and gave up the supremacy in this Chamber because eight of us—not myself but eight others—believed the Constitution and the law required the keeping of the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. KELLOGG] the sitting member now upon this floor, we are taunted with being a party of vandals, spoliators, and robbers, who seek to get all they can and hold it afterwards without law and without right.

At the last session of the Senate if we heard one thing more than any other, and from high and distinguished authority, it was that the voice of a constitutional majority is the voice of God. Sir, I invoke the voice of the Deity to-day. I invoke the dogma announced then by the republican party upon this floor. Where is "the constitutional majority?" It happens to be with the democratic party, but it is hardly a divine utterance, I take it now. By a party movement of a portion of the republican party, and by the act of Providence which struck down the generous and brave Senator from Rhode Island, it happens, without any act on our part, that we to-day hold the majority under the Constitution. In the debate in the Forty-fourth Congress, upon the very question which has been alluded to to-day, whether the President pro tempore is removable at the option of the Senate, the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] gave us certain advice which I propose to follow. I read from an authority so distinguished and so disinterested. Said that Senator then:

One fit occasion—

For the election of a President pro tempore:

One fit occasion would be the absence of the President pro tempore. Another fit occasion might be his becoming unfit to discharge the duties of his office. Another fit occasion might be as I should say instead of being contrary to propriety, in all propriety the case that was mentioned the day before yesterday, when the parties of this body being responsible for the exercise of governmental powers and for the course of legislation should change; and when parties should change and one party should find itself brought into power with a President pro tempore of the other party in the chair, exercising the great powers that the President of the Senate does exercise, I should say it would be the duty of that party, instead of a wrong, to change the President pro tempore, because he is the organ of the responsible body, and without his being in harmony with the political views of the gentlemen in the majority their will might often be frustrated. He appoints special committees; he does a thousand things which are of the greatest importance to the political interests of the country; and to say that one party may saddle another for the time being with a President pro tempore, and that that other party, when the times shall change, and they become responsible for the administration of affairs, cannot oust him and have a presiding officer of their own, would, in my opinion, be contrary to the principles of republican government. A party cannot get on that way, and it ought not to get on that way.

And I say "amen" to the declaration.

Mr. EDMUNDS. So do I.

Mr. VEST. Sir, if we are in the majority, even if for but ten minutes, we are responsible, and it is our duty and our right under the Constitution and under the law to choose our own officers.

Mr. President, this is a mandatory statute so far as our duty here to-day is concerned. We seek to wrest nothing from the republican party; we seek simply to meet the responsibility placed upon us by the law of the land, the rule of the Senate, the public sentiment of the country, and as I honestly believe by the dictate of conscience and of duty.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] to the resolution of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. PENDLETON,] on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Let the amendment be reported.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chief Clerk will report the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. At the end of the resolution it is proposed to add the words "for this day;" so as to read:

Resolved, That THOMAS F. BAYARD, a Senator from the State of Delaware, is hereby chosen President pro tempore of the Senate for this day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is the Senate ready for the question upon the amendment?

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ANTHONY, (when his name was called.) Upon this question I am paired with the Senator from Delaware who sits nearest me, [Mr. BAYARD.]

Mr. MCPHERSON, (when his name was called.) I am paired with my colleague, [Mr. SEWELL.] I make the statement once for all.

The roll-call was concluded; and the result was announced—yeas 33, nays 34; as follows:

YEAS—33.

Allison,	Ferry,	Kellogg,	Rollins,
Blair,	Frye,	Logan,	Saunders,

Bayard,	McPherson,

So the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on agreeing to the resolution proposed by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. PENDLETON.]

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. Chairman, the edict having been registered, in some other place, I fear, that these two States shall go unrepresented at this moment, and that the Senate by its present majority will proceed to elect a President pro tempore indefinitely, it is my next duty to move to strike out the name of Senator BAYARD and insert the name of Senator ANTHONY; and so I move to strike out the words, "THOMAS F. BAYARD, a Senator from the State of Delaware," and insert the words, "HENRY B. ANTHONY, a Senator from the State of Rhode Island and of Providence Plantations," to be exact about it; and on that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] upon which the yeas and nays are demanded.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 32, nays 34; as follows:

YEAS—32.

Allison,	Ferry,	Jones of Nevada,	Morrill,
Blair,	Frye,	Kellogg,	Plumb,

Farley,	Jackson,	Ransom,

ABSENT—7.

Anthony,	Davis of Illinois,	McPherson,	Sewell.
Bayard,	Fair,	Platt,

So the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the resolution proposed by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. PENDLETON.]

Mr. EDMUNDS. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 34, nays 32; as follows:

YEAS—34.

Beck,	Garland,	Johnston,	Saulsbury,
Brown,	George,	Jonas,	Slater,
Butler,	Gorman,	Jones of Florida,	Vance,
Call,	Groome,	Lamar,	Vest,

Edmunds,	Ingalls,	Mitchell,	Van Wyck.

ABSENT—7.

Anthony,	Davis of Illinois,	McPherson,	Sewell.
Bayard,	Fair,	Platt

So the resolution was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair appoints the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY] and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] to escort the President pro tempore of the Senate elect to the chair.

Mr. BAYARD was escorted from his seat by Mr. ANTHONY and Mr. PENDLETON, and upon taking the chair as President pro tempore of the Senate said:

SENATORS: I fully appreciate the honor paid me by this expression of your confidence, and in assuming the duties of President pro tempore of the Senate in obedience to law and in accordance with the rules of this body and vote of the majority, I should have greater misgivings of fulfilling acceptably the requirements of the post were it not for the assurance, that so long as I shall continue to exercise its duties I shall receive your co-operation and friendly aid,—which I now earnestly and confidently ask at your hands.

We are all painfully mindful of the unusual circumstances under which we meet, and of the national bereavement which has caused this special session of the Senate.

May it not be hoped that, touched by a sense of common sorrow and chastened by a grief that penetrates every household in our great family of States, our proceedings shall be marked by a spirit of concession and harmony,—a generous consideration for mutual differences of opinion, a softening of partisan asperities, and a high intent to perform our duties in a manner responsive to the demands of the occasion and the best interests of our common country.

With such hopes and in such a spirit I now assume and shall endeavor to perform the duties of the high position to which your favor has assigned me.

CREDENTIALS.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I again rise to a question of the highest privilege. Upon the credentials now lying on your table I move first that Hon. Nelson W. Aldrich, Senator-elect from the State of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations, be now sworn into office.

Mr. PENDLETON. In order that we may have an opportunity of examining the credentials of the Senator-elect whom it is now proposed to swear in, and the credentials laid upon the table of the two Senators-elect from New York, I move that the Senate adjourn until to-morrow at twelve o'clock.

Mr. EDMUNDS. On that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] has moved that the oath of office be administered to the Senator-elect from Rhode Island, and pending the consideration of that motion the Senator from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] has moved that the Senate do now adjourn, and upon that the yeas and nays have been demanded.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

The name of Mr. ALLISON was called, and he answered in the negative.

Mr. HOAR. I ask leave before the motion is put to inquire of the Senator from Ohio if it has ever been known——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will pause. Is there unanimous consent to the remarks of the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. HOAR. I wish to put merely an inquiry with reference to the courtesy due under our customs to another branch of the Government, whether it has ever been known that the Senate organized and adjourned without first communicating the fact of its organization to the President of the United States?

Mr. PENDLETON. It was with no disposition to prevent a notification to the President of the United States of the organization of the Senate that I proposed a motion to adjourn in order to prevent the swearing in of the Senators-elect without an opportunity of examining their credentials. With the unanimous consent of the Senate I will withdraw the motion to adjourn that the President of the United States may be notified of the organization of the Senate. I had some doubt of its propriety.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the withdrawal by the Senator from Ohio of his motion to adjourn, the Chair understanding that the roll-call had commenced and that one Senator had already answered to his name?

Mr. PENDLETON. The withdrawal will only be for the purpose of entertaining a motion to notify the President of the organization of the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That being the purpose, I feel obliged as a matter of higher privilege than notifying the President of the United States to insist upon the right of these States to be first tried and either let in or excluded.

Mr. PENDLETON and others. Let the roll be called.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The call of the roll on the motion to adjourn will proceed.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 35, nays 34; as follows:

YEAS—35.

Bayard,	Farley,	Jackson,	Ransom,
Beck,	Garland,	Johnston,	Saulsbury,
Brown,	George,	Jonas,	Slater,
Butler,	Gorman,	Jones of Florida,	Vance,
Call,	Groome,	Lamar,	Vest,
Camden,	Grover,	Maxey,	Voorhees,
Cockrell,	Hampton,	Morgan,	Walker,
Coke,	Harris,	Pendleton,	Williams.
Davis of W. Va.,	Hill of Georgia,	Pugh,

NAYS—34.

Allison,	Edmunds,	Jones of Nevada,	Plumb,
Anthony,	Ferry,	Kellogg,	Rollins,
Blair,	Frye,	Logan,	Saunders,
Cameron of Pa.,	Hale,	McDill,	Sawyer,
Cameron of Wis.,	Harrison,	McMillan,	Sherman,
Conger,	Hawley,	Mahone,	Teller,
Davis of Illinois,	Hill of Colorado,	Miller,	Van Wyck.
Dawes,	Hoar,	Mitchell,
Edgerton,	Ingalls,	Morrill,

ABSENT—4.

Fair,	McPherson,	Platt,	Sewell.

So the motion was agreed to; and (at two o'clock and fifty-eight minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow at twelve o'clock.

TUESDAY, October 11, 1881.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

SWEARING IN OF SENATORS.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, as a question of the highest privilege under the rule that I read yesterday, I ask that the oaths of office be administered to Mr. Aldrich, and I shall follow that, it being disposed of, with asking the same thing as to the other Senators-elect.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont moves that the oaths of office be administered to the Senator-elect from Rhode Island. The question is on that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator-elect will please come forward for the purpose named.

Mr. ALDRICH advanced to the Vice-President's desk, escorted by Mr. ANTHONY, and the oaths prescribed by the acts of June 1, 1789, and July 2, 1862, having been administered to him, he took his seat in the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I now move that the oaths of office be administered to the two Senators-elect from the State of New York, Mr. Miller and Mr. Lapham, who are present.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Pending that question, I rise to present a petition. I hold in my hand a petition, or rather a paper, affecting the motion of the Senator from Vermont. It is a communication signed by certain members of the Legislature of the State of New York, alleging certain reasons why Hon. Warner Miller and Hon. Elbridge G. Lapham are not entitled to seats in this body. With respect to the allegations I know nothing, and I have not the personal acquaintance of any of the gentlemen who have signed the petition. I do not offer it now with any desire to delay action upon the administering of the oath to the gentlemen named.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask the Senator to whom the paper is addressed?

Mr. MCPHERSON. It is addressed to the Senate of the United States.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is then a petition or memorial?

Mr. MCPHERSON. And in deference to the right of petition I have deemed it my duty to present it. I therefore offer the petition with the statement that at the proper time I shall move to refer it to the appropriate committee.

Mr. EDMUNDS. As the petition bears or purports to bear upon the propriety of the swearing in of these gentlemen, I think it right, within the spirit of the rule which I have stood upon, not to object to its reception in connection with this question, and I do not object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the reception of the petition pending the motion of the Senator from Vermont? ["None."] The Chair hears none and the petition is received and will lie upon the table. The question is upon the motion of the Senator from Vermont, that the Senators-elect from the State of New York be now sworn into office. [Putting the question.] The "ayes" have it. The Senators-elect will step forward to the desk and take the oaths of office.

Mr. LAPHAM and Mr. MILLER advanced to the Vice-President's desk, escorted respectively by Mr. EDMUNDS and Mr. SHERMAN, and the oaths prescribed by the acts of June 1, 1789, and July 2, 1862, having been administered to them, they took their seats in the Senate.

NOTIFICATION TO THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. PENDLETON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That a committee, consisting of two Senators, be appointed to wait on the President of the United States and inform him that a quorum of the Senate has assembled, and that Hon. THOMAS F. BAYARD, a Senator from the State of Delaware, has been chosen President pro tempore of the Senate, and that the Senate is ready to receive any communication he may be pleased to make.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. How shall the committee be appointed?

Mr. COCKRELL and others. By the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the Chair will appoint the Senator from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] and the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY] as such committee.

HOUR OF MEETING.

Mr. COCKRELL submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the hour of the daily meeting of the Senate be twelve o'clock meridian, until otherwise ordered.

RECESS.

Mr. HARRIS, (at twelve o'clock and fifteen minutes p. m.) I move that the Senate take a recess for one hour.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois, and others. Say half an hour.

Mr. HARRIS. At the suggestion of several Senators around me I will modify my motion and say a recess of half an hour instead of an hour.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee, that the Senate take a recess for half an hour.

The motion was agreed to; and at the expiration of the recess (at twelve o'clock and forty-five minutes p. m.) the Senate reassembled.

STANDING COMMITTEES.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the standing committees of the Senate as they were constituted at the close of the last session of the Senate be continued for the present session, and that the President pro tempore be authorized to fill up any vacancies now existing in said committees respectively.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, let that resolution go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the rule the resolution will lie over.

COMMUNICATION WITH THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. PENDLETON and Mr. ANTHONY, the committee appointed to wait upon the President of the United States and notify him of the organization of the Senate, appeared below the bar.

Mr. PENDLETON. Mr. President, the committee appointed to wait upon the President of the United States and inform him that a quorum of this body is present, and that it is organized by the election of Mr. BAYARD as President pro tempore, has performed that duty and received from the President an answer that he would communicate with the Senate in writing to-morrow morning.

ACCOUNTS OF SECRETARY BURCH.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will lay before the Senate a communication from the financial clerk and have it read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

OFFICE OF SECRETARY OF THE UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington, October 10, 1881.

SIR: The death of Hon. John C. Burch, late Secretary of the Senate, on the 28th of July, 1881, having rendered impossible my compliance with section 62 of the Revised Statutes, I have the honor to submit herewith directly to the Senate a full and complete statement of the receipts and expenditures of the Senate, showing in detail the items of expense under proper appropriations, the aggregate thereof, and exhibiting the exact condition of all public moneys received, paid out, and remaining on hand from July 1, 1880, to July 3, 1881.

Also, a statement of balances on hand, amounts drawn, and the disposition made of such funds from the 4th of July, 1881, to the 6th of August, 1881, accompanied by letters from the First Comptroller and Register of the Treasury certifying that the accounts of Hon. John C. Burch, deceased, are balanced and closed on the books of the Treasury Department.

I also submit a full and complete account of all property belonging to the United States in the possession of the late Secretary of the Senate on the 28th of July, 1881.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

R. B. NIXON, Financial Clerk.

HON. T. F. BAYARD,
President of the Senate pro tempore.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the letter and accompanying papers be printed and lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. President, if there be no further business I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at twelve o'clock and forty-nine minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, October 12, 1881.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

VICENZO REBELLO.

Mr. KELLOGG. I offer the following resolution and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be directed to transmit to the Senate all papers on file in his office relating to the seizure of one Vicenzo Rebello, an Italian, in the city of New Orleans, in June, 1881, by one James Mooney, under a warrant of arrest issued by John A. Osborn, United States commissioner in and for the city of New York, of date June 17, 1881, running in the "name of the President of the United States" and addressed to "any marshal of the United States or his deputy or other officer in any State, district, or Territory within the jurisdiction of the United States, to James Mooney," and also all papers relating to the subsequent extradition of said Vicenzo Rebello.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think it had better go over. I know the subject ought to be inquired into; but I am a little afraid that the resolution is so broad as to call for diplomatic papers between the two countries which it might not be suitable to submit. Therefore it strikes me that the resolution either ought to be modified to some extent, or be addressed to the President, requesting him "if in his judgment compatible with the public interests;" and therefore I ask that the resolution may go over for consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the rule, the resolution will lie on the table and be printed.

STANDING COMMITTEES.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution that I offered yesterday concerning the committees.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont, that the Senate do now proceed to the consideration of the resolution offered by him yesterday relating to the standing committees of the Senate.

Several SENATORS. Let it be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following resolution yesterday submitted by Mr. EDMUNDS:

Resolved, That the standing committees of the Senate as they were constituted at the close of the last session of the Senate be continued for the present session, and that the President pro tempore be authorized to fill up any vacancies now existing in said committees respectively.

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. President, I request the Senator from Vermont to permit the resolution to lie over, at any rate until we receive some communication from the Executive, and I will give my reasons to the Senator and to the Senate for making the request.

It is very evident that we cannot do any legislative business at this extra session of the Senate. We can only perform executive business. It is also evident—we all know it to be a fact—that the committees appointed at this extra session will only live during the lifetime of the session; they will expire when this session passes out. We have some thirty-six or more standing committees under the rule; and it is certainly true that at this session it will not be necessary to organize even a fourth of those committees. Of course I could not, nor could any other Senator, say definitely what committees just now would be necessary; but we can safely assume that there will not be needed possibly over seven or nine of the standing committees to transact the business of this extra session. Under the resolution the others would be organized with the attachés and employés of those committees, simply as a mere matter, I suppose, of ornament to this extra session, with no labors to perform, but at an expense to the Government. When the President communicates to us what he wants us to do in executive session we shall then know what committees should be appointed in order to consider and report upon the executive business.

I think, with due respect to the Senator from Vermont and everybody else, that the committees which will be necessary to transact this work, and they alone, should be organized at this session of the Senate. I say this with utter indifference, so far as I am concerned. For one I am utterly indifferent as to how the membership of the committees shall be distributed at this short extra session; but I do think that the standing committees provided for under the forty-seventh rule should be appointed and organized now only so far as may be necessary for the purpose of doing the business which we are called to do, and the extent of which we can only know from the communications of the Executive. I make this suggestion to the Senator from Vermont with a view of expediting the business of the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The resolution that I had the honor to offer yesterday is precisely the resolution that the Senate has invariably adopted on occasions like this. At the beginning of a Congress when there is a called session of the Senate and when theoretically there is one-third of the whole body of Senators new—although not always so in fact—the committees have been reorganized with a view to the adjustment of personal duties among the whole body of Senators; but at called sessions of the Senate like this one, not at the beginning of a Congress, and when if there be any new Senators the number is always as in this instance extremely small, I repeat that it has been, I think, the invariable practice to pass just such a resolution as I have had the honor to offer.

I am not unmindful of the fact that now (however differently it may have been two or three days ago) the political strength of this body is in the neighborhood, I will say, of an equipoise. I do not wish to speak with precision about such nice matters, and so I will say "in the neighborhood of an equipoise"—"there or thereabouts," as the witnesses in horse-suits say. I do not forget that; and were this a session where there was to be a long continuance of duties of all kinds, it would be worthy of consideration, particularly in view of what has already taken place, how far the committees should be adjusted in order to have them represent as far as they might all the political forces in the body. About that I express no opinion further than I have already done; but I do say, that it appears to me that for the purpose of disposing of the executive business which I hope may be disposed of by Saturday or Monday, if we are diligent and desire to do it, the question of the reorganization of the committees, more or less, with a view to rectifying any supposed inequalities that may now exist in regard to chairmanships or whatever, would be a very trivial work.

It does not appear to me that I should feel, (although nobody can say until he has tried,) if I occupied the position of my friend from Arkansas in reference to the committees at this moment, that it was any part of my Republican mission to insist upon a reorganization of the committees if they were constituted at this moment of all Democratic chairmen, on the theory that we are to stay here only a very few days to do this little work. But however valuable it might be, the profit, to use a mercantile phrase, would not pay the expense of the performance, because that requires a readjustment among gentlemen of all sides of their personal views and wishes, and consultations which are not political ones in the sense in which I was speaking just a minute ago, but the convenience of Senators on all sides and their views as to the places where they think they can do best for the public business on committees.

Now I do not think it would be practicable to undertake to do that on this occasion; and inasmuch as the session is to be so short, it did not appear to me that any gentleman on the other side of the Chamber would think that the circumstance that the chairmanships of most of the committees are now held by Republicans would be of sufficient consequence for this very short period of time to make any suggestion about it.

Of course, gentlemen have a right to make the suggestion and to try the question by the Senate, and I concede it freely; but I only make these suggestions as to the way it appears to me. I think it will be found in respect of executive business that nearly every committee will have more or less of work to do, because I think I may say without violating the rules in regard to executive sessions that we find, taking the general run of two or three hundred nominations, that they naturally, from the nature of the service for which the various people are named in these nominations, would go to a very large number of committees, and we cannot tell to which ones until we get them, and if we get a batch to-day we cannot tell what will come to-morrow.

But as my friend from Arkansas desires that this matter should not be pressed at this time, I will withdraw my motion with pleasure, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion of the Senator from Vermont, to proceed to the consideration of the resolution submitted by him, is withdrawn for the present.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

At twelve o'clock and eighteen minutes p. m., Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of the secretaries of the President of the United States, appeared at the bar of the Senate and said:

Mr. President, I am directed by the President of the United States to deliver to the Senate several messages in writing.

The messages having been delivered and laid on the desk of the President pro tempore were found to be of an executive character, with one exception.

INTERNATIONAL SANITARY CONFERENCE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table and be printed:

To the Senate of the United States:

I transmit herewith to the Senate a communication from the Secretary of State submitting the text in the English and French languages of the proceedings of the International Sanitary Conference, provided for by the joint resolution of the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, held at Washington in the early part of 1881.

CHESTER A. ARTHUR.

WASHINGTON, October 12, 1881.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. EDMUNDS I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After twenty minutes spent in executive session, the doors were reopened.

DEATH OF SENATOR BURNSIDE.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. President, I rise to perform a most mournful duty. I present certain resolutions passed by the city council of the city of Providence upon the death of my late colleague, AMBROSE EVERETT BURNSIDE. Contrary to my usual custom, I ask that they be read and that they be entered at length on the Journal.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolutions will be read at the desk.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

THE CITY OF PROVIDENCE.

Joint resolutions of the city council.

Whereas General AMBROSE E. BURNSIDE, United States Senator for the State of Rhode Island, died September 13, 1881; and

Whereas his remains are to lie in state at the city hall in the city of Providence until the day of his funeral on Friday, September 16, 1881, at twelve o'clock noon: Therefore,

Resolved, That we, the city council of said city of Providence, representing the feelings of sorrow which our citizens share alike in the death of a brave and distinguished soldier, a high-minded legislator and citizen, do hereby recognize the great loss sustained by the nation, the State, and the city.

Resolved, That, as a mark of respect to the memory of the deceased soldier and statesman, the city hall be closed to the transaction of public business from eleven o'clock a. m. on Thursday, September 15, 1881, to the Saturday following, at nine o'clock a. m., and that the city council attend his funeral in a body.

Resolved, That the city clerk be hereby directed to transmit copies of the aforegoing to the family of General BURNSIDE and to the United States Senate.

Passed in common council, September 14, 1881; in board of aldermen same day.

Approved September 14, 1881.

WILLIAM S. HAYWARD, Mayor.

A true copy of record.

Attest: HENRY V. A. JOSLIN, City Clerk.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. President, the sad event which these resolutions deplore occurred at the country house of General BURNSIDE, near Bristol, on the morning of the 13th of September, by a disease so insidious and so rapid that it did not assume a threatening aspect until within an hour of its fatal termination.

This sudden and unexpected bereavement threw the State into mourning. Every man in it felt that he had lost a friend, a brother, a father, or a son. The governor, responsive to the general desire, ordered to his memory the honor of a public funeral and charged himself with the execution of the order. It was one of the most imposing and wonderful demonstrations of public respect and popular affection ever witnessed in the State. The officials and the chief dignitaries of the State participated in the solemn ceremonies. Distinguished personages from without the State, including members of both Houses of Congress, some from far distances, and at great personal inconvenience, attended to pay the last tribute of respect to Rhode Island's dead Senator.

The melancholy procession wound its slow way through streets lined with a sorrowing population and somber with the draperies of woe. Loving hands laid his form by the side of the bride of his youth; his old companions in arms discharged their farewell volleys over his grave.

Already measures have been inaugurated for the erection of a statue which shall attest to coming generations how dear he was to the people whom he served so well and so faithfully.

Such honors Ilion to her hero paid,
And peaceful slept the mighty Hector's shade.

At a future time, Mr. President, when the other House of Congress shall be in session to respond to the action of this, my colleague and myself will ask the suspension of public business, that the Senate may pay fitting tribute to the character, the virtues, and the services of General BURNSIDE.

I move, as a mark of respect to his memory, that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at twelve o'clock and forty-three minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

THURSDAY, October 13, 1881.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

A message, in writing, was received from the President of the United States by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries.

INTEROCEANIC CANAL.

Mr. LAMAR submitted the following resolution; which was read:

Resolved, That the President be requested, if not in his judgment incompatible with the public interest, to advise the Senate whether any action has been taken by the Government since the adjournment of the last Congress towards protecting the rights and interests of the United States in the projected interoceanic canal at Panama.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Mississippi ask for the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. LAMAR. No, sir; let it lie on the table for the present, and I shall call it up to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will lie on the table and be printed.

STANDING COMMITTEES.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution touching the continuation of the committees, which I had the honor to offer the other day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont moves to proceed to the consideration of the resolution offered by him the day before yesterday relative to the election of the standing committees. Is the Senate ready for the question?

Mr. GARLAND. Let the resolution be reported.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be reported.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution submitted by Mr. EDMUNDS on the 11th instant, as follows:

Resolved, That the standing committees of the Senate as they were constituted at the close of the last session of the Senate be continued for the present session, and that the President pro tempore be authorized to fill up any vacancies now existing in said committees respectively.

Mr. GARLAND. I beg leave to offer the following amendment to the resolution——

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is the resolution taken up, sir?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on taking up the resolution.

Mr. GARLAND. I suppose there is no objection to taking it up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and the resolution will be considered as before the Senate. The Chief Clerk will now report the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas to the resolution of the Senator from Vermont.

The CHIEF CLERK. After the word "Senate," in line 2 of the resolution, it is proposed to insert the following:

Excepting the Committees on Privileges and Elections, Appropriations, Manufactures, Private Land Claims, Agriculture, Revolutionary Claims, Claims, the District of Columbia, Patents, Territories, Railroads, Mines and Mining, Revision of the Laws of the United States, Education and Labor, Civil Service and Retrenchment, the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, Engrossed Bills, Improvement of the Mississippi River and its Tributaries, and Transportation Routes to the Seaboard.

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. President, there is no disposition that I know of to delay the consideration of the resolution at all; but in keeping with the remarks that I submitted to the Senate yesterday it has occurred to me that ten committees are all that will be necessary to transact the business of the session. If the amendment which I have offered be adopted, it will leave the following committees organized as they were at the last session to do the work of this session: The Committees on Foreign Relations, Finance, Commerce, Military Affairs, Naval Affairs, Judiciary, Post-Offices and Post-Roads, Public Lands, Pensions, and Indian Affairs.

I offer this amendment for the purpose, as I conceive, of expediting the business of the Senate, with no disposition to delay the organization and being willing to submit to the organization as constituted now.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, the resolution that I had the honor to offer was a resolution in the substantial form of all those that have been offered on similar occasions, from the time when we first began to have standing committees down to this time; and it has not been thought desirable on all these former occasions or any of them to make exceptions in respect of the temporary continuation of all the committees for the purposes of a short called session like this.

If there were any great object of economy to be attained by agreeing to the amendment proposed by my friend from Arkansas, I should certainly be glad to listen to it, and would listen to it with a strong inclination to support it; but I am not able to see it in that way. We do not know that the Committee on Privileges and Elections will not have something to consider at this present session, for to its keeping ordinarily is intrusted the regulation of the privileges of the Senate and their defense. We have on our table now a petition presented by the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. MCPHERSON,] said to seriously affect the right of a Senator from the State of New York to a seat in this body; and every question of that kind, as we all agree, ought to be considered at the earliest possible moment after the election of a President pro tempore. There was a difference as to what ought to be done before that time, but after that we all agree that we ought to make haste to do justice.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator from Vermont will pardon me. There is so much conversation going on in the Chamber that we cannot hear on this side at all.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I cannot hear myself even.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senators will suspend conversation that interferes with debate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is not so much Senators, I suspect, as visitors, all of whom are undoubtedly here in accordance with the rules of the Senate!

I was saying, Mr. President, that the Committee on Privileges and Elections, which is the first exception proposed by my friend from Arkansas, is a committee that ought to be organized and apparently ought to do something immediately, for on the theory of what was stated by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON] it may be that we have an intruder in this body; and it may be on the other hand that faction and malevolence and falsehood and contrivance have concocted something in the form of a petition to be presented to this body to affect a particular event that the authors of it would prefer should sleep rather than be investigated. In either case I think we ought to have a Committee on Privileges and Elections, and have it now.

The next exception is the Committee on Appropriations. Of course we understand that no appropriations can be made at this session of the Senate; but there are or there may be proposals of appointments that rightly and properly might be referred to such a committee. As to the Committee on Manufactures, I confess I do not know precisely what its duties are, but as a celebrated Kentuckian once said, about an institution that no longer exists in this country, "it has become hallowed by time." Then there is the Committee on Private Land Claims, which (as I have sometimes been a member of that, as you, Mr. President, are now its chairman) we all understand has constant work whenever its members can be here, and has an annual clerk for that reason, in the investigation of land titles, and we all know that sundry nominations go to that committee. The Committee on Agriculture is the next in these exceptions. There are offices in the governmental department of the United States the nominations for which would properly go to that committee.

The Committee on Revolutionary Claims I confess I do not feel so sure about, for I for one am not a revolutionary man. The Committee on Claims frequently has matters of consideration, nominations and others, at called sessions, as does the Committee on the District of Columbia, which is the next; as does the Committee on Patents, (for I will not waste time in going through these,) as does the Committee on Territories, and undoubtedly that committee will at this present session have duties to perform. The same as to the Committee on Railroads, in respect of which we know from public report and not from anything that has taken place in closed doors, that there has been an important officer suspended for some supposed failure to perform his duty, or other reason, and we know that by law it is required that such a suspension shall be reported to this body; and so on. To that committee that matter I suppose would naturally go.

As to the Committee on Mines and Mining, I am not advised. As to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws of the United States, I am not advised. The Committee on Education and Labor very naturally may have something to do at this session. The same is true of that on Civil Service and Retrenchment. That ought to have something to do at every session; and how we are to get on in this session without civil service and retrenchment, I am unable to see. The same of the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. That is a committee which every day, in vacation as well as in session, has to pass upon vouchers; and I think it was continued during the recess in order to do that thing. The recess has ended——

Mr. GARLAND. I had thought of that in reference to the committee the Senator now speaks of, but my impression is, after examining the matter, that it is continued by a law. If such be not the case, of course I desire to include it in the committees to be continued.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I need not go through the two or three other cases in the list, because I think I have stated enough (and I state it in all candor) to my friend from Arkansas to lead him to consider whether there are not several at least of these committees in the list that undoubtedly will have special and particular duties connected with executive affairs to perform at this session.

Now as to the whole of them, although their continuance involves the expense undoubtedly of the per diem of the clerks of those of them not annual clerks, (as the clerks of the Committees on Appropriations and Private Land Claims are, and I do not know but some others, where it involves no expense at all,) I do submit to my friend from Arkansas and to all gentlemen on the other side and upon this side of the Chamber that considering the nature of the Senate and the nature of the duties of Senators, in undertaking to save the expense of one clerk who has to write letters or send documents for the members of one committee, if that committee has not anything to do at all, and to force the seven gentlemen, as nearly equally divided between the two parties as they can be, unless you can find a man who belongs to both parties alike,—to deprive these gentlemen of both parties of the advantage of being assisted in the duties that they have to do here during the week or ten days of our session in order to save the six dollars a day for this one young gentleman to attend to the business, to assist them, as it appears to me, is making an apparent saving of dollars at a great waste and injury of public interests.

I hope, therefore, sir, without enlarging upon it, that the Senate will not agree to the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. GARLAND. The statement of the Senator from Vermont, except as to two committees which were included in the exception, is one of conjecture. It may be that we shall have business for all these committees, and it may be that we shall not. After a careful revision of the whole subject it occurred to me and other Senators that ten committees would be sufficient, and upon the positive statement of the Senator from Vermont he has only added two to the number, which are the Committee on Privileges and Elections and the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. From a statement just made to me by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON] I am satisfied there will be business for the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and in the doubt as to the Committee on Contingent Expenses of the Senate, I am willing to strike that out of the exceptions, as well, also, as the Committee on Privileges and Elections. That will make it twelve, and I ask to amend my amendment to that extent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the modification indicated by the Senator from Arkansas to his amendment will be made.

Mr. EDMUNDS. He has a right to modify it in its present stage.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be modified to the extent stated by the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. GARLAND. That being the case, I think we shall have by the amendment all the committees that will be necessary, if, in fact, we shall not have some that will not be necessary for the business of this session; but I want to state that if in the course of the business at any time it appears to the Senate that there is a necessity for any one of these committees, upon the motion of any Senator I should not object to its being organized as it existed at the last session; and I think that meets the whole case.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND] to the resolution offered by the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.]

Mr. TELLER. Let the amendment be read as modified.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to insert after the word "Senate," in line 2 of the resolution, the following words:

Excepting the Committees on Appropriations, Manufactures, Private Land Claims, Agriculture, Revolutionary Claims, Claims, District of Columbia, Patents, Territories, Railroads, Mines and Mining, Revision of the Laws of the United States, Education and Labor, Civil Service and Retrenchment, Engrossed Bills, Improvement of the Mississippi River and its Tributaries, and Transportation Routes to the Seaboard.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is the Senate ready for the question? [Putting the question.] The Chair is unable to decide as to the result.

Mr. TELLER. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered and taken.

Mr. JOHNSTON, (after having voted in the affirmative.) I forgot at the moment when I voted that I am paired with the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES.] I withdraw my vote.

The result was announced—yeas 35, nays 37; as follows:

YEAS—35.

Bayard,	Farley,	Jackson,	Ransom,
Beck,	Garland,	Jonas,	Saulsbury,
Brown,	George,	Jones of Florida,	Slater,

ABSENT—4.

Dawes,	Fair,	Johnston,	Platt.

So the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now recurs on the resolution of the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. HARRIS called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I was reminded a day or two ago by my distinguished friend from North Carolina [Mr. RANSOM] that there was one select committee of the Senate that had the special mission of seeing what could be done about the health of the city in connection with the Potomac River here, that ought to be continued; and I should be glad, that being the case, to add that committee to the standing committees.

Mr. RANSOM. Mr. President, I wish that my friend from Vermont was exactly correct in his statement. It is not a special committee. The committee to examine the question of the Potomac flats is the Committee on Commerce. That question was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and a sub-committee has been appointed under the Committee on Commerce to attend to that question. If the Committee on Commerce is revived, that revives the sub-committee.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is all right, then.

The yeas and nays were taken.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I am paired with the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES.]

The result was announced—yeas 37, nays 35; as follows:

YEAS—37.

Aldrich,	Ferry,	Lapham,	Rollins,
Allison,	Frye,	Logan,	Saunders,
Anthony,	Hale,	McDill,	Sawyer,

Coke,	Harris,	Pendleton,	Williams.
Davis of W. Va.,	Hill of Georgia,	Pugh,

ABSENT—4.

Dawes,	Fair,	Johnston,	Platt.

So the resolution was agreed to.

ELECTION OF PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I ask leave to present a resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois offers a resolution, which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That DAVID DAVIS, a Senator from the State of Illinois, is hereby chosen President pro tempore of the Senate.

Mr. LOGAN. I ask for the immediate consideration of the resolution, if there is no objection.

Mr. PENDLETON. I ask that the resolution lie over under the rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The present consideration of the resolution being objected to, it lies over under the rule.

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. SHERMAN. If there is no further business in open session, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio moves that the Senate do now proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After twenty minutes spent in executive session, the doors were reopened.

ELECTION OF PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE.

Mr. PENDLETON. Mr. President, when the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] offered his resolution for the election of a President pro tempore of the Senate, inasmuch as it was offered without previous notice, I objected to its immediate consideration. Since then, upon reflection and consultation with gentlemen upon this side of the Chamber, I have concluded to withdraw my objection to its immediate consideration, which I now do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. HARRIS in the chair.) The objection of the Senator from Ohio interposed to the resolution offered by the Senator from Illinois is withdrawn. Is there other objection to the present consideration of the resolution? The Chair hears none, and the resolution is before the Senate and will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That DAVID DAVIS, a Senator from the State of Illinois, is hereby chosen President pro tempore of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is the Senate ready for the question upon agreeing to the resolution?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Mr. President, before this question is submitted to a vote of the Senate I for one wish to repeat a protest which I once made here on this subject by denying the power of the Senate to do this thing. I am not content to occupy my seat quietly and let this question pass by without saying a few words upon it.

It is true it may be said that this is no longer an open question, that a precedent was established in the Forty-fourth Congress by which the right of the Senate to change at will its presiding officer was affirmed. I hope that the action of the Senate at that time will not be considered as a precedent, because if there is one question upon which the great minds of this country were divided then it was this. We had an interesting debate upon it at one time and a good deal of light was shed.

Mr. President, Congress by an act passed in 1792 has declared that the presiding officer of the Senate shall succeed in a certain contingency to the office of President of the United States. The language of the Constitution does not say that the President pro tempore of the Senate is an officer of the Senate in the sense that the Sergeant-at-Arms or the Secretary or the Chief Clerk is. It declares that the Senate shall have the power to elect its own officers, and a President pro tempore during the absence of the Vice-President; and when a President pro tempore of the Senate is elected by that body during the absence of the Vice-President, the Constitution, in my judgment, has fixed the tenure of his office. You have filled the vacancy which the organic law has provided for, and you have no power, in my judgment, to undo it.

It has been said here time and again on former occasions that we had the same power over our presiding officer that the House of Representatives has over its Speaker, and analogies from the English system have been presented. What is the rule in the British Parliament to-day? Has it ever been the rule there that when a speaker was elected he was regarded as holding his office at the will of the body? He holds his office during a Parliament, and no change of majority in the house has ever been claimed to possess the power to unseat him.

There is no fixed tenure to the office of Speaker of our House of Representatives; still I do not know an instance where he has been changed. But an act of Congress has cast an important duty in a certain contingency upon this officer of the Senate. Congress has declared that the President pro tempore of the Senate in the case of the death or resignation or inability of both the President and Vice-President shall become President of the United States; and when the Vice-President is called from his chair to the executive office, you are required to fill the vacancy thereby occasioned, which you have done in this case; but now you turn around a few days after you have taken this action required by the Constitution and propose to undo your own work. Where would this lead? What did the Constitution mean when it declared that the office should be cast upon the officer designated by law? It did not mean that in any case the Senate of the United States should engage in a wrangle over the presidential office; it did not mean that the office should be cast upon a particular Senator or a particular man, but it contemplated that if such an unfortunate contingency should arise the office would fall upon the officer that had been designated to fill the permanent vacancy previous to the contingency which made it necessary for him to go into the first office.

Now, I do not wish to add to anything I have said hitherto on this subject, but I wish to read what Mr. Seward said in his day upon this question. In 1854 Mr. Seward said:

Before we proceed with this election, I should like to have the views of Senators in regard to the effect of the appointment—whether it is to be an absolute appointment of a President pro tempore, and what the tenure of his office is to be. I will state very freely my own opinion in going into this election, and it is this: that there can be but one person at the same time holding the office of President pro tempore of the Senate of the United States, and that that person will hold his office until it shall again constitutionally become vacant; so that in the case of a vacancy occurring in the office of the President of the United States the person now to be chosen to fill the office of President pro tempore of the Senate would succeed to that high trust and become the Chief Executive Magistrate of the United States.

In my judgment, a more unwise precedent, if precedent it is to be regarded, never was established by the Senate than when it declared that this body should have the power in case of anything unfortunately happening to the present incumbent of the executive office to enter into a contest for the Presidency of the United States. I shall do no more now than put on record my views as expressed to the Senate on the 10th of January, 1876:

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Mr. President, I agree in all that has been said by the committee in the report except what is stated in their last conclusion, and I concur entirely with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MERRIMON] in the views he has expressed in regard to this case.

Whatever might have been the construction of the Constitution before the act of March 1, 1792, was passed, it is very clear that that act must have great weight in the consideration of the question before us. It is not enough to show, therefore, by the terms of the Constitution, that the President pro tempore of the Senate is an officer of the Senate, and under those provisions alone would be removable at the pleasure of the Senate. It is possible that such a construction would have been warranted before the act of 1792 was passed; but the Constitution gave to Congress the right to say, and that body has said, what officers shall succeed to the office of President in the event of the death of the President and Vice-President. While it may be true, therefore, that the Constitution intended to place the President of the Senate under the control of this body and make him removable at its pleasure, if no legislation was had under the first section of the second article of the Constitution, which empowers Congress to provide for filling the office of President when the two first officers in the Government are dead or are removed, still, the last provision in the Constitution gives Congress the power to change the tenure of the office of the President of the Senate when it gives it authority to say that the person who fills it in a certain exigency shall be President of the United States.

If the power conferred upon Congress touching the filling of the office of President of the United States be in conflict with that which is supposed to exist on the part of this body to remove its presiding officer, then reasonable construction must decide the question at issue. It is not enough to say that the President pro tempore of the Senate, like the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate, is an officer of this body, and because the Sergeant-at-Arms may be removed by the Senate, so may the President pro tempore be removed. This mode of reasoning would be admissible if Congress under the Constitution had not pointed out duties beyond the Senate for the one officer in a certain contingency which it has not prescribed for the other.

This is the great point, in my opinion, upon which this debate must turn.

If Congress has the right (which no one will deny) to cast upon the President pro tempore of the Senate the office of President of the United States when the President and Vice-President are dead, and in order to guard against doubts and uncertainties is a matter of so much importance, it becomes necessary that the tenure of office of the President of the Senate should be fixed, can it be said that the right to remove such officer on the part of the Senate should supersede the right of Congress to designate him as heir expectant of the Presidency? Or, to put the proposition in another shape, if Congress under an express provision of the Constitution has the right to cast upon the President of the Senate duties and powers, either in presenti or in expectancy, which are in conflict, or which may come in conflict, with the right of the Senate to remove such officer, derived by implication, which power shall prevail? The right of this body to remove this officer is a right derived by implication, while the other right exercised by Congress is in virtue of an express power given by the Constitution. The Constitution made it the duty of Congress to declare by law what officer shall exercise the executive office of the nation when left vacant by both the President and Vice-President. Congress accordingly has provided that in such a contingency the office shall be filled by the President of the Senate or the Speaker of the House for the time being. Congress was not invested with the general power to fill the office; but the Constitution requires that it shall provide by law what officer shall act as President in such an exigency. Law, as defined by a great master of jurisprudence, is a rule of action, prescribed by the supreme power in the state, commanding what is right and forbidding what is wrong. It is distinguishable from a sudden and transient order proceeding from the whims and caprices of despots. It implies permanency and uniformity, and is prescribed or published in order that all may know the duties it enjoins and the penalties which its violation will incur.

The law then designates the President pro tempore of the Senate as the officer who shall succeed to the Presidency in the contingency mentioned. How will this law operate with the right asserted in behalf of this body to remove that officer at its pleasure? Remember that the law provides that if there be no President pro tempore of the Senate the Speaker of the House shall act as President. All experience teaches us that nothing is more dangerous to the peace and security of nations than those conflicts which arise out of disputes about the right to the chief office in the State.

Nothing can be more important to the safety of the Republic and liberties of the people than the removal of all doubt, or the means of creating doubt, as to the persons entitled to the office of President of the United States. Persons with doubtful titles may, and often do, get into the local or subordinate offices; but let any man enter into the office of President of the United States whom a majority of the people of this country believe is not entitled to it, and they would be tempted to remove him by force. There was a time in the history of the country when it was not considered sound to reason from the existence of a power to the abuse of it. We have all seen enough in our day and time to convince us that the only real danger to which this grand fabric of government is exposed is the excitement, passion, and conflicts resulting from party spirit.

I am not unaware that as a member of the minority of this body, entertaining hopes that a change will take place in the political complexion of the majority, my interest and the interests of those with whom I act here lies in a different direction from the one in which my argument leads me; but, sir, while feeling, as all do, the influence of party attachment and principles, I think, sir, I feel more strongly at this time the necessity of using the little power at my command in strengthening every rampart which the Constitution has erected for the protection and security of our liberties. This body we know is subject to change. It has changed in the past and it will change in the future. It has never yet happened, I believe, that a President of this body was called to the office of President; but it may happen at any time. True wisdom requires that we should always be prepared for what is possible to occur.

We know that occasions may arise when this body and the other House will feel the force of excitement sure to result from a vacancy in the executive office. We are without a Vice-President to-day. There is but one step from the chair of the Senate to that of the nation. Who can tell what a day may bring forth? There is no greater security for the life of a prince than exists for the life of a beggar.

> Within the hollow crown
> That rounds the mortal temples of a king
> Keeps Death his court; and there the antic sits,
> Scoffing his state and grinning at his pomp;
> Allowing him a breath, a little scene
> To monarchize, be fear'd, and kill with looks;
> Infusing him with self and vain conceit,—
> As if this flesh, which walls about our life,
> Were brass impregnable; and humor'd thus,
> Comes at the last, and with a little pin
> Bores through his castle wall, and—farewell king!

With the absolute power of removal over the officer who is designated by law to fill the office of President, if the occasion should arise, which I pray it may not, for putting in practice this part of our Constitution, to what intrigue and political excitement would not this power lead in the Senate when it was within its competency to designate the man who should occupy the first place in the nation! The power given in the Constitution to the Senate to choose its own President would in that event be converted into a power to elect a President of the United States. But, sir, this is the body which has the power to remove from office by impeachment. A large partisan majority here and in the other House may remove both the President and Vice-President, and they may be prompted to do this by the hope of getting some favorite into the presidential office. Mark you, that in case of the removal of both the President and Vice-President the Senate, under the rule insisted upon on the other side, would elect the President. Is it wise to give to that tribunal which alone has the power under the Constitution of removing the President and Vice-President absolute power to name their successor? Need it be said, sir, that little checks like the one we advocate in this case might prove sufficient to save the State? This very power of the Senate to elect or remove a President at pleasure might lead to combinations and conspiracies to promote the fortunes of particular men. I do not argue now from the virtues or vices of any party, but I argue from the known passions, weaknesses, and imperfections of human nature itself. True, there are some powers I would not give to any party, and all that I say on this subject I intend to apply to all political organizations.

Why is it that the question now under debate has been brought before us? No complaint has ever been made against the gentleman in the chair on account of the manner in which he has performed his duties. No one supposes that this subject would now be agitated had we not lost the Vice-President. And what does this show? It shows that the Senate is looking beyond the office of President of the Senate, and, recognizing the uncertainties of life, is anxious about the person who might be called to the first office in the Government. And this, in my opinion, is not what the Constitution intended. It did not mean that the Senate should say who should be President in the exigency stated. If it did, very strange language has been employed to convey this meaning. But the Constitution gave Congress the power to decide this question, and that body has designated the officer. According to our view the President of the Senate, selected without reference to any higher duties than belong to that office, would in the emergency mentioned succeed to the Presidency. In the other case the Senate would have the power while complying with the letter of the law, and furnishing an officer for the vacancy filling the description in the statute, to exercise in its choice as to the person who should be placed at the head of the Government. Let the present situation illustrate the question. The present presiding officer was elected at a time when no thought was entertained of the death of the Vice-President. He was liable to be superseded at any moment by the latter officer. If during the absence of the Vice-President he and the President died, were removed, or resigned, Mr. FERRY would have become President. In that case there would have been no opportunity for the Senate to engage in a contest about the succession under one view of the law. But how would the case stand under the other view? Should sickness or accident imperil the life of the Chief Magistrate, then the Senate would have the power to exercise a choice as to the person who might be called to the Presidency. The selection of a President pro tempore of the Senate under such circumstances would become a selection of a President of the United States. And will any man say, or can he say, that with such a momentous issue cast upon this body there would not be much of the feeling, the acrimony, passion, and excitement, and with them much of the danger attending an ordinary election for that high officer?

But, sir, this is not all. As I said awhile ago, the Constitution provides that if there be no President pro tempore of the Senate the Speaker of the House, in the emergency stated, shall act as President. Remember now that while this body may bind its own members by its decision respecting the capacities and powers of its own presiding officer, so far as these relate to his ordinary duties in this body, it cannot claim the right to bind, and it cannot bind by any decision it may make, the other House of Congress in regard to this right of removal, in so far as that right involves the question of title to the Presidency. The House of Representatives being equally interested in this question with the Senate, has a right to decide for itself. And while this body may confirm this report and affirm that the Speaker of the House is removable at the will and pleasure of that body, and that therefore the President of the Senate is removable at the pleasure of this. And I would say here, by way of parenthesis, that the conclusion arrived at is because the Speaker of the House is removable at the will and pleasure of that body the President pro tempore is likewise removable by this.

Mr. MERRIMON. What authority is there for saying that the Speaker of the House may be removed at the will of the House?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. None. The people's Representatives may possibly come to a different conclusion, and they may say, as they have the right to say, that their Speaker holds his office for two years and is not removable at pleasure, and that the presiding officer of this body holds his office by a like tenure. It is hardly necessary for me to say what conclusion this reasoning will justify. If the Senate should act upon the theory of this report and displace their President when in the judgment of the House they had no right to do so, and a vacancy occurred in the office of President, the House might be found claiming the office of President of the United States for their Speaker and the Senate for their President. This condition of things could never result from the law as we understand it; for, although the House might believe in the power of removal as set up in this report and the Senate in a fixed tenure of office, no harm could come from such a difference. This is all I have to say on this part of the case.

I contend that by the very words of the Constitution the power of removal does not exist. The Constitution gives to the Senate the right to elect a President pro tempore in the absence of the Vice-President. Upon the appearance of the latter officer the right of the former to the chair terminates. The language is:

"The Senate shall choose their other officers, and also a President pro tempore in the absence of the Vice-President, or when he shall exercise the office of President of the United States."

The language in regard to the Speakership is:

"The House of Representatives shall choose their Speaker and other officers."

No one who has studied the Constitution can fail to detect the pointed difference in the language employed in the two cases. The Senate is not to choose their President pro tempore and other officers, but their own officers and a President pro tempore.

It is not denied in the report of the committee that the Vice-President, when presiding over the Senate, holds his position independent of our pleasure. He is not liable to be displaced at the will of a majority. He is entitled to preside as long as he holds his office. And who can say that the framers of the Constitution, in providing for a permanent presiding officer of this body, did not consider it important that he should be clothed with independence in that important station? Every parliamentary body is composed of partisans, and these are divided into a majority and minority numbers. The rules or constitution of all such bodies are intended in a great measure to protect the rights of the minority. The majority can always protect itself. Nothing is more important to the fair and just application or enforcement of these rules than a presiding officer who can hold with an even hand the scales of justice between the majority and the minority. He is to some extent a judge. He is expected to decide many questions affecting the parties in the house, and all agree that he ought to decide fairly. How is this object to be attained? or is it so unimportant that no provision should be made to secure it? If it is an end worthy of attention, can anything be more plain than that the complete independence of the presiding officer, if not absolutely essential, will contribute very greatly in securing fairness and impartiality in the discharge of his duties? This is the more important in the Senate because of the long tenure of our offices. Under our system the great corrective power is with the people, and in the other House if any man abuses his power he may be brought to account before his constituents in two years. But here it is necessary to have some safeguards for the rights of the minority outside of the people. In the case of the President of the Senate it is to be found in the independence with which he is clothed. If it is wise and proper that the permanent presiding officer of this body should be independent, is it not equally so that the President pro tempore should be? It is possible that an officer of the latter character might preside over this body for four years. A President pro tempore must preside when the Vice President acts as President, and this has already occurred more than once in our history, and for nearly the whole term of the office.

Mr. President, it is well known that there was but one parliamentary body in the world at the time of the adoption of our Constitution whose history was looked to as an example by the men who devised the organization of this and the other House of Congress. That was the English House of Commons. Upon this subject none of the ancient republics afforded any light. They were governed by no fixed laws; indeed they were rude democracies, where violence and tumult often reigned supreme. The English Commons was at that time a model parliamentary body. Some of the most extraordinary statesmen and orators of the world had, before the time I speak of, rendered it famous by the display of their genius and eloquence. Besides, it was the body in which the great questions that drove the American Colonies into revolution were discussed, and it attracted for many years the most intense interest on this continent. Throughout the Federalist it is constantly referred to, which shows that it had been well studied by the leading men of the revolutionary era. All the Colonial Legislatures were formed after this great model, and it can hardly be doubted that when this body and the other House were created it was expected that the powers and duties of the officers who should fill these respective offices would be similar to those of the officers of the English House. That body always had a speaker and a sergeant at-arms. The speaker was always elected from among the returned members. Our Constitution, in providing for the election of a Speaker, did not deem it necessary to say that he should be selected from among the members of the House. The English practice, like the great source of light in judicial difficulties, the common law, settled the question. Now what was the law governing the subject under debate in the English House of Commons at the time of the adoption of our Constitution? The report of the committee says that the Speaker of the other House holds his office at the pleasure of that body; and the same rule must prevail here in regard to the President pro tempore. The Constitution is silent upon the subject, and reason and authority are all that we have to guide us. The law in force in the House of Commons then and now is that the speaker shall hold his office during the whole Parliament, unless by resignation or death a vacancy arises.

One more point and I will conclude. The Constitution gives to the Senate the right to choose a President pro tempore in the absence of the Vice-President. This is an express power, limited to a particular case. From whence does the power of removal come? It is not written in the Constitution. Where does the Senate obtain the right to exercise an implied power, for such the power of removal is in this case? Are there any implied powers vested by the Constitution in Congress? Yes. But in whom or what department? The Constitution declares that—

"The Congress shall have power to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof."

Congress, and Congress alone, is the authority which the Constitution has invested with the right to carry into execution all implied powers. And if Congress should say that the Senate might remove its President it would bind the other House, and thus avoid the difficulties pointed out in the forepart of my argument.—Congressional Record, volume 4, part 1, Forty-fourth Congress, first session, pages 314 and 315.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is the Senate ready for the question upon agreeing to the resolution of the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. LOGAN. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BAYARD, (when his name was called.) Mr. President, I propose to withhold my vote upon this question. I have never obtained office by my vote, and I shall never retain it by my own vote. I am glad the question is taken to-day.

Mr. HOAR, (when the name of Mr. DAWES was called.) My colleague [Mr. DAWES] is paired with the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. JOHNSTON.]

Mr. RANSOM, (when Mr. JOHNSTON's name was called.) It has already been stated, but I was requested by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. JOHNSTON] to announce that he was paired with the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES.]

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. PLATT. I desire to announce that I am paired with the Senator from Nevada, [Mr. FAIR.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution is agreed to. The Chair appoints the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] and the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY] to escort the President pro tempore elect of the Senate to the chair.

Mr. BAYARD and Mr. ANTHONY escorted Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois, to the chair.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois, on taking the chair as President pro tempore, said:

SENATORS: The honor just conferred upon me comes as the seat in this body which I now hold did, without the least expectation on my part. If it carried any party obligation, I should be constrained to decline this high compliment. I do not accept it as a tribute to any personal merit, but rather as a recognition of the independent position which I have long occupied in the politics of the country.

I am profoundly grateful for this mark of confidence, and it shall be my endeavor, as it will be my duty, to administer the trust with impartiality and with entire fairness.

Being untrained in parliamentary practice I shall rely on the indulgence of the Senate in this respect, and hope for generous co-operation from all sides.

The Senate will please come to order.

THANKS TO MR. BAYARD.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I think it not only a duty but a pleasure to move that the thanks of the Senate be expressed to the Hon. THOMAS F. BAYARD, the retiring President pro tempore, for the dignity and impartiality with which he has presided over this body during the short period that he has done so. I am sorry to see some Senators smile, because I am absolutely in earnest. The Senator from Delaware came to the chair under circumstances of excitement and trial; and although his career has been short, as one of his political adversaries, in all sincerity I wish to express my obligation to him for the entire impartiality with which, when partiality might have done injury, he has conducted the duties that were assigned to him. I make that motion, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate has heard the motion of the Senator from Vermont, that the thanks of the Senate are presented to Mr. BAYARD, the retiring President pro tempore, for the dignity and impartiality with which he has discharged the duties of his office.

The motion was unanimously agreed to.

NOTIFICATION TO THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. LOGAN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That a committee consisting of two Senators be appointed to wait on the President of the United States and inform him that Hon. DAVID DAVIS, a Senator from the State of Illinois, has been chosen President pro tempore of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. How shall the committee be appointed? ["By the Chair."] The Chair appoints the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] as the committee.

VICENZO REBELLO.

Mr. KELLOGG. I offered a resolution yesterday calling upon the Secretary of State for certain papers in a recent extradition case. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] objected for the time being on the ground that the resolution was too broad. After consulting with the Senator from Vermont in regard to his objection, I have concluded to accept a suggestion made by him, which I think will obviate all objection from any quarter to the resolution; which is to strike out, after the word "the" in the first line of the resolution, the words "Secretary of State be directed" and insert "President be requested, if in his opinion it is not incompatible with the public interests," and to strike out the words "on file in his office" and insert "on file in the office of the Secretary of State." With these amendments I ask that the resolution be agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Will the Senate take up the resolution of the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. GARLAND. Let it be reported.

Mr. KELLOGG. Here is the resolution as amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read, and then the amendments to it.

Mr. KELLOGG. I have modified the resolution, and ask that the resolution as modified be read.

Mr. HARRIS. I understand the Senator from Louisiana has a perfect right to modify his resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. He has, certainly.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution as modified, as follows:

Resolved, That the President be requested, if in his opinion it is not incompatible with the public interests, to transmit to the Senate all papers on file in the office of the Secretary of State relating to the seizure of one Vicenzo Rebello, an Italian, in the city of New Orleans, in June, 1881, by one James Mooney, under a warrant of arrest issued by John A. Osborn, United States commissioner in and for the city of New York, of date June 17, 1881, running in "the name of the President of the United States," and addressed "to any marshal of the United States, or his deputy, or other officer in any State, district, or Territory within the jurisdiction of the United States, to James Mooney," and also all papers relating to the subsequent extradition of said Vicenzo Rebello.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on proceeding to the consideration of the resolution at the present time.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Louisiana has modified the resolution, as he has a right to do, in the particulars mentioned.

Mr. KELLOGG. Now I ask the adoption of the resolution. I presume there will be no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There being no objection, the Chair will submit the question on the resolution as modified.

The resolution as modified was agreed to.

GARFIELD MEMORIAL.

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President, my attention has been called to a subject on which we all feel alike, by an accomplished lady who has given much study to subjects of the kind, the result of which is that I offer the following resolution, to be accompanied by some other papers:

Resolved, That the Joint Committee on the Library of Congress be, and is hereby, instructed to inquire into the expediency and propriety of causing a medal to be made in gold commemorative of the tragic and most lamentable death of James A. Garfield, late President of the United States.

The letter which I hold in my hand was not written to me for publication, but it is so full of information and pertinent suggestion that I shall take the liberty myself of asking the Chief Clerk to read it for the information of the Senate, in connection with the resolution which I have offered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The letter will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

WASHINGTON, October 8, 1881.

SIR: It may not have occurred to any member of your honorable body to commemorate the sad death of our beloved President by introducing a resolution ordering a medal to be struck in his honor.

The Government of the United States has issued comparatively few national medals, (I do not now recall a metallic memorial upon the loss of a statesman or warrior ordered by Congress to be given occasionally to an eldest son.) Although we are culpably negligent in these observances, you and I know that no one has ever lived in this land who, by nature and through culture, would have more appreciated such a national recognition of a citizen's worth than James Abram Garfield. I have ventured upon a design which I herewith send, in a crude state, as suitable for the occasion, and when I see you will give my full meaning which will possibly be obscure on paper, yet all-sufficient on metal.

Should Congress pass a resolution ordering such a medal it will be a memorial more prized, more classic, more lasting than pillared temple or marble column. I would suggest that a medal, engraved by an American artist, be struck in gold, and with suitable resolutions be presented by a joint select committee to Henry Garfield, eldest son, and from him to descend forever to the eldest male representative of James Abram Garfield. Furthermore, let it be resolved that a medal from the same die be struck in bronze, and with resolutions of thanks, and recognition of the sympathy expressed by the different nations and rulers in our sorrow, be given to each of those nations and rulers; also that the same medal be given to the President of the United States and his Cabinet, to resident foreign embassadors and ministers, the Chief Justice and the associate justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, the General of the Army, the Admiral of the Navy, to each Senator and Representative of the present Congress, and to the late President's corps of physicians.

The price of the bronze medals, (after the die has been made,) with handsome case of leather, and resolutions printed on silk, need not exceed $10, and the medal might be within the reach of any citizen. I have selected an artist to draw this design under my immediate direction. The portrait on the medal shall be approved by Mrs. Garfield.

Description of medal.—(Three and one-half inches in diameter.) Obverse: Profile bust of President Garfield.

Above bust to be inscribed "Filius Patriæ."

Inscription encircling "James Abram Garfield. Born November 19, 1831. Inaugurated President of the United States of America March 4, 1881. Died September 19, 1881."

Reverse: Legend—Thirty-eight stars. A promontory on which stands a flourishing oak tree, riven by a thunderbolt. Beside the tree is the figure of Columbia, with bowed head; one hand pointing to the tree. With the other she clasps to her bosom the staff of the flag of our country at half-mast. On the sea, in the distance, are sails, bearing messages of sympathy to us from foreign nations.

In exergue. The date of passing this resolution.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully,

ELIZABETH BRYANT JOHNSTON.

Hon. D. W. VOORHEES, United States Senate.

Mr. VOORHEES. I ask that the resolution and accompanying papers and design be referred to the Committee on the Library.

Mr. COCKRELL. Ought not the resolution to go to the Committee on Mines and Mining? That committee has more to do with the matter.

Mr. VOORHEES. I think not.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to take the opportunity, during the pendency of the resolution of the Senator from Indiana, to state that my colleague and I, Senators from the State in which General Garfield lived all his life, have deemed it advisable, with the concurrence of members of the Senate, not to make any formal announcement of his death to the Senate at this session, but to await the assembling of the two Houses of Congress at the regular session, when, no doubt, appropriate memorial ceremonies will be ordered by the two bodies.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. VOORHEES,] to refer the resolution with the accompanying papers and design to the Committee on the Library.

The motion was agreed to.

APPOINTMENTS AT CINCINNATI POST-OFFICE.

Mr. VOORHEES submitted the following resolution; which was read:

Whereas certain rules and regulations of the post-office at Cincinnati, Ohio, have been approved by the Postmaster-General, among which occurs the following: "5. New appointments will be made to the lowest grade in the class where vacancies may occur, and no application will be entertained from any person under twenty or over thirty years of age;" and

Whereas this rule necessarily excludes from appointment all the Union soldiers who served in the war for the suppression of the rebellion: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads be, and is hereby, instructed to inquire by what law or authority such a rule has been approved by the Postmaster-General, and to report to the Senate the result of its investigation.

Mr. VOORHEES. I ask the reference of the resolution to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not know anything about the facts recited, and I think the resolution had better be referred without any formal adoption. That will bring the subject up before the committee.

Mr. VOORHEES. My motion is to have the resolution referred, and I make it at the suggestion of others about me, although I should be inclined to ask for its adoption. I wish to say by way of explanation that I hold in my hand the printed rules and regulations of the post-office at Cincinnati, approved by the Postmaster-General in 1879, among which is the rule I have set out in the resolution. If it be the pleasure of the Senate to have it referred to the committee for inquiry, I have no objection.

Mr. SHERMAN. I prefer that course. I do not want the resolution adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. HOAR. What is the motion? Let it be stated by the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is to refer the resolution, which is one of inquiry.

Mr. SHERMAN. There is quite a difference between adopting the resolution and referring it without adoption. As I understand, the Senator from Indiana proposes to have the resolution referred without adopting it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the motion which the Chair indicated.

Mr. VOORHEES. I think myself the better way would be to adopt it, but out of deference to the Senator from Ohio, as this is a post-office in his own State, I will follow his suggestion and let it be referred.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to refer the resolution to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HARRIS. There seems to be no other business before the Senate at this moment, in view of which fact I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at one o'clock and thirty-five minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

FRIDAY, October 14, 1881.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

COMMUNICATION WITH THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. LOGAN and Mr. PENDLETON, the committee appointed to wait upon the President of the United State and notify him of the election of Hon. DAVID DAVIS as President pro tempore of the Senate, appeared below the bar.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, the committee appointed yesterday to inform the President of the United States that Hon. DAVID DAVIS, of Illinois, had been elected President pro tempore of the Senate, have performed that duty.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a letter from the Attorney-General, transmitting, agreeably to Senate resolution of May 19, 1881, a list of the names of officers, clerks, and other employés borne upon the rolls of the Department of Justice, not required to be confirmed by the Senate; which, on motion of Mr. HARRIS, was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

INTEROCEANIC CANAL.

Mr. LAMAR. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution touching the interoceanic canal which I had the honor to offer yesterday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Mississippi moves that the resolution submitted by him yesterday relative to the interoceanic canal be now taken up. It will be so taken up unless there be objection. The Chair hears none, and the resolution is before the Senate.

The resolution was considered and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the President be requested, if not in his judgment incompatible with the public interest, to advise the Senate whether any action has been taken by the Government since the adjournment of the last Congress toward protecting the rights and interests of the United States in the projected interoceanic canal at Panama.

EXTRADITION OF FUGITIVES.

Mr. EDMUNDS submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Judiciary Committee be instructed to inquire and report whether the proceedings for the extradition of one Vicenzo Rebello under the treaty with the Kingdom of Italy, have been proper under the treaty and in accordance with law; also to inquire and report whether the method of procedure in cases of the extradition of alleged fugitives from the justice of foreign countries under the treaties with such countries and the acts of Congress, has heretofore been such as sufficiently to protect alleged fugitives from injustice, and what further legislation, if any, is necessary for that purpose; and that the committee have power to send for persons and papers.

ALLEGED TREASURY IRREGULARITIES.

Mr. SHERMAN. I offer for adoption a resolution, and ask for its present consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to transmit to the Senate a copy of the report of James F. Meline and others made to the Treasury Department during the recess of the Senate, and of any papers received by him based upon such report.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask that the extract which I send to the Chair be read, as a reason why the resolution should be adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chief Clerk will read the paper.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

[From the New York Commercial Advertiser, October 11, 1881.]

TREASURY IRREGULARITIES—THE SUBJECT ATTRACTING MORE AND MORE ATTENTION—DEMANDS FOR THE SUPPRESSED REPORT.

WASHINGTON, October 11.

A great deal of speculation has been indulged in respecting the character of the report made during the summer by the committee which investigated the alleged irregularities in the Treasury Department. The report was understood to reflect upon custodian Pitney, and his discharge promptly followed. Whether the report really discloses any bad practices on the part of any others now or formerly in the Department is purely a matter of speculation, for the reason that Secretary Windom has persistently refused to make it public. It is considered very strange that Secretary Windom still persists in keeping the result of the committee's work a secret, and in some quarters it is believed that ex-Secretary Sherman is the moving spirit in having the evidence taken withheld from the public, in order that no reflections upon his administration can be made. It has become a well-known fact that there was looseness in the manner in which the contingent expenses of the Treasury Department were managed, and that small sums were diverted from their legitimate purposes to pay bills incurred in connection with Secretary Sherman's candidature for the Republican presidential nomination, but not with the consent or knowledge of that official. It is believed here that Secretary Sherman was as much shocked by the disclosures as must have been his successor, Mr. Windom, and that he naturally does not want any further publicity, and therefore is desirous that Mr. Windom shall not allow the report to get into the public prints.

In the mean time, however, two or three prominent Treasury officials have become objects of suspicion, and statements injurious to their official integrity have become extensively circulated. As long as the policy is pursued of locking up the report as though it was a charge of dynamite dangerous to friend and foe alike, the public will not be able to decide the officials who are subjected to suspicion are guilty or innocent of any of the scandalous practices so freely charged.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, the writer of this paragraph is very much mistaken in supposing that I have in any way sought or wished to withhold from the public the report referred to. I neither have nor will I oppose or delay any investigation of the Treasury Department while I was its chief officer. The only wish I have is to see that every officer accused of improper conduct shall have a fair chance to defend himself, and then he must stand or fall according to the rectitude or wrong of his conduct.

The only doubt I have in calling for this report now is the fact that Mr. Windom did not order its publication lest injustice might be done to worthy and faithful officers who had no opportunity to cross-examine witnesses or answer charges made against them. I have no doubt that he either has given or will give them this opportunity. At all events the Senate can do so. I therefore offer this resolution and hope the Senate will promptly pass it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I sympathize entirely with the personal wish of the Senator from Ohio to have brought to light any document which is alleged to reflect upon him; but the Senate ought to remember that in the operations of the Treasury Department, like those of the other Departments of the Government, it probably is not an exaggeration to say that every week reports are made to the head of the Department touching the transaction of its business that it would be highly injurious to public interest to make public. It might enable guilty parties to escape, and produce in a variety of ways that I need not take the time to state serious inconvenience to the public interest.

While I entirely sympathize with the feeling of the Senator from Ohio, I am very far from being sure that it is right to adopt the resolution without some reflection and some further information as to what may be the scope of this supposed report. Indeed the Senate does not know that there is any at all; and why should we make a direction of this kind upon the Secretary of the Treasury? Of course both Houses of Congress proceed upon the idea, and rightly, that there is no officer of the Government except the President of the United States who is not bound, when directed to do so, to lay every paper in his Department before either House of Congress, but whether it is wise for Congress always to call for every paper is another question.

I feel justified, then, against the wishes of my friend from Ohio, in asking that this resolution may lie over until we can consider about it. Probably it is of no consequence in this particular case; but as a precedent for calling out the reports of inquiries and investigations and other transactions in any of the Departments on the motion of any member without any particular knowledge of them, as a precedent, I say, it may be a very injurious one. I ask, therefore, that the resolution go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will go over under the rule.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After one hour and thirty minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

RECEPTION OF FOREIGN VISITORS.

On motion of Mr. EDMUNDS, it was Ordered, That the Sergeant-at-Arms be authorized to carry out the provisions made for the reception of the national visitors to take place in the rotunda of the Capitol to-day.

On motion of Mr. ANTHONY, it was Ordered, That the privileges of the floor of the Senate be extended to the national visitors.

RECESS.

Mr. HAWLEY, (at one o'clock and fifty minutes p. m.) I move that the Senate take a recess until half past two o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and at the expiration of the recess (at two o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.) the Senate reassembled.

Mr. ANTHONY. I move that the recess be extended to three o'clock.

The motion was agreed to: and at three o'clock the Senate was again called to order by the President pro tempore.

SENATE DISBURSEMENTS.

Mr. MORGAN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to furnish to the Senate a copy of any orders made by him since the 28th day of July, 1881, relating to the payment or disbursement of money from the Treasury appropriated for the payment of Senators, the officers, and employés of the Senate, and the contingent expenses of the Senate, together with any reports or decisions of the officers of the Treasury Department touching the power and duty of the Secretary in ordering such payments or disbursements.

RECEPTION OF FOREIGN VISITORS.

At three o'clock and fifteen minutes p. m. the representatives of the Government and people of France and the descendants of General La Fayette and of the Baron Steuben (invited under the joint resolution of February 18, 1881, to attend as the guests of the United States the Yorktown Centennial Celebration) entered the Senate Chamber, accompanied by the French and German ministers accredited to the United States, the Secretary of State, and other heads of Departments, with the assistant secretaries. The distinguished visitors having been seated in chairs provided for the purpose in the rear of the seats of Senators—

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I beg leave to apprise the Senate of the presence upon the floor of this Chamber of certain distinguished officers and citizens of our sister republic of France, and also of certain other distinguished officers and citizens of the Empire of Germany, who have come hither for the purpose of joining with the people of the United States in celebration and commemoration of the great culminating victory to the arms of the United Colonies in their struggle for independence one hundred years ago—the joint victory of those colonies and their allies, their allies from that day to this.

I know that I speak the sentiment of every member of the American Senate when I say they are most welcome. And I now move that, for the purpose of each member having an opportunity to pay that respect which each and all feel for those who have so honored us by their presence, a recess of half an hour be taken to enable the presiding officer of the Senate and each one of its members to pay that respect to these guests of our whole people which represents not only our individual feelings, but the feelings of every State and of every man in every State of our Union of States. [Applause on the floor and in the galleries.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senators, you have heard the motion of the Senator from Delaware. Those who favor the motion will say "ay." [Putting the question.] It is adopted unanimously; and the Senate will take a recess of half an hour.

The Senate accordingly took a recess for half an hour, during which time the Senators paid their respects to the visiting guests. At the expiration of the recess (at three o'clock and forty-five minutes p. m.) the Senate was again called to order.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After thirty minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at four o'clock and fifteen minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

SATURDAY, October 15, 1881.

REPORT ON COTTON-GOODS TRADE.

Mr. MORGAN. I offer a resolution, and I ask for its present consideration.

The resolution was read as follows:

Resolved, That 2,500 copies of the report of the Secretary of State upon "The Cotton-Goods Trade of the World," just prepared, be ordered for the use of the Senate, and that the sum of $500 be, and is hereby, appropriated for that purpose; and that the same be distributed proportionately to Senators by the Department of State, as usual with the monthly consular reports.

Mr. MORGAN. I have asked that the Senate will allow that resolution now to come up and be adopted.

Mr. CONGER. I ask that the resolution be reported again. I was unable to hear a word of it. I desire to hear what is read from the Clerk's desk, if it is possible.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Gentlemen will please take their seats, and the resolution will be again read. The Chair would suggest to the Senator from Alabama whether the resolution does not have to go to the Committee on Printing, inasmuch as an appropriation is called for.

Mr. MORGAN. It would have to go to the Committee on Printing, I confess, under the rule, if this was not a publication that the Senate had ordered to be made; but under the circumstances of the case I think it would not. On that subject, however, I will submit to the opinion of some other Senators more experienced than myself.

Mr. HARRIS. I beg to suggest to the Senator from Alabama, as his resolution makes an appropriation, I think of $500, the propriety of modifying it so as to require the payment to be made out of the contingent fund of the Senate, or of striking that provision out altogether, as the Senate certainly has no power at this present session to make an appropriation from the Treasury.

Mr. MORGAN. I concur with the Senator in that view. I will state that the resolution was drafted at my request and hastily prepared, and as I only at this moment arrived in the Senate Chamber I had no opportunity of revising it.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think the Senator from Alabama will accomplish the purpose of his resolution by providing that 2,500 copies be printed for the use of the Senate.

Mr. MORGAN. That is the purport of the resolution.

Mr. ANTHONY. An appropriation would require the action of the other House, and there are ample facilities for distribution here.

Mr. MORGAN. I will modify the resolution in that respect. I at once saw the trouble after I offered the resolution, but did not have time to modify it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The fifty-fourth rule would indicate that such a resolution making an appropriation must be referred to the Committee on Printing to consider the cost of the publication. Will the Senator modify his resolution?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, sir; I will modify it. [A pause.] It will read now as follows:

Resolved, That 2,500 copies of the report of the Secretary of State upon "The Cotton-Goods Trade of the World," just prepared, be printed for the use of the Senate.

I desire to make a brief statement about this matter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will allow the resolution to be read as modified so that all can understand it.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution as modified.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, within a year past the Secretary of State sent out a circular letter to our consuls throughout the world asking them for detailed information in respect of the growth of cotton, its manufacture, and the markets for cotton fabrics and other textile fabrics, wool and cosmos or wild hemp, throughout the world. Forty-nine reports, I think, have been made to the State Department, and they have been accompanied with samples and exhibits of the cotton and cosmos and wool, and the productions manufactured in the various countries of the world from these staples. Finding them in the State Department, I ventured to request that the Secretary of State would send those samples, with copies of the consular reports, to the great cotton exposition at Atlanta. He very kindly consented to do so. Since that time the attention of several Senators upon this floor has been called to the exhibits and to the reports.

The Secretary of State addressed a letter, as was proper, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, in which he set forth a summary of the information which had been gleaned from the forty-nine reports, showing, as I believe, the most important, the most accurate, and the most thorough exposition of the cotton manufactures and the manufactures of various other textiles that has ever come from the press, at least in the United States, and I dare say any where in the world.

The Secretary first in his letter makes a résumé of the results of this information gained from the consuls. He then submits in connection with each sample of goods the consular reports, showing what goods are manufactured in the various countries of the world, both by machinery and by hand. He then shows the markets of these different countries, the prices at which the goods can be sold there and are now being sold, and the cost of the goods at the place of their production. He shows all the various styles of goods that are made in the United States, and in Germany, and in France, and in England, for all the different markets of the world, exhibiting samples along with the statements of the consuls.

Then there is a comparative statement drawn from the reports of the consuls of the British Government, by which the reports of our consuls may be brought in contrast with those of other governments, and the spinner, the merchant, or the producer may have an opportunity of testing by these comparative examinations the accuracy of all these various reports.

The samples sent to the exposition at Atlanta have been numbered and the numbers correspond with the description contained in these consular reports.

Then in an appendix all the cotton tariffs of all countries of the world are given, and the money in which those tariffs are payable reduced to the standard of the United States; and so in like manner the weights are made to correspond with our standard of weights, so that an exporter, a spinner, a manufacturer, or any person interested in the subject, can at a glance determine the cotton tariff of any country in the world, whether it be an export or an import duty that is laid.

Take it altogether, Mr. President, I do not hesitate to say, in my humble opinion, that it is certainly the most instructive volume that has ever been issued by our Government in reference to this very great subject.

One important fact is disclosed in the letter of the Secretary, which is that to-day more goods are worn in the world that are manufactured out of cotton by hand than of the goods that are manufactured by machinery, showing thereby that the market of the world furnishes an unlimited opportunity for the increase of the cotton manufactures of the United States.

Then, again, the statement is made that four-fifths of the cotton that is spun in the world by machinery is exported from the United States. The fact appears there that the British Government in its efforts to introduce cotton growth in India has almost entirely failed, and the importations to India from the United States are increasing in a very large ratio annually of the raw cotton and also of cotton goods manufactured in the United States.

The volume contains somewhere about five hundred pages, and the information is so important that I think the Senate should increase the number which is provided for by the appropriation of the last Congress at least by this number of 2,500 copies, which I ask for in this resolution, and I shall be tempted at some subsequent day of this session again to ask the Senate to contribute another sum of money—$500 is the limit to which we can go in one order—to print 2,500 more copies. The work is now in press; nothing is to be done except the setting up of a few pages that have been distributed, fourteen or fifteen only; nothing else is to be done except to run the paper through the press; and it is for that reason that, at this executive session, I have thought it was my duty to ask the Senate to make this little contribution toward the publication.

The value of these consular reports I think every Senator has already learned to appreciate. They certainly have contributed most materially to the information of all classes, industrial and commercial, in this country who are concerned in all of those industries which we are seeking now to push forward into the various foreign markets of this world.

I hope that the Senate will adopt the resolution.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, there is no sort of doubt about the importance of the document presented by the State Department, and I hope that we shall at least print it. As to whether the bulk may not be so great as to prevent our obtaining 2,500 copies within the limit prescribed by law to the Senate, I am a little in doubt. If it is a volume of five hundred pages, I am inclined to think that it cannot be printed for the sum to which the Senate is restricted, without the concurrence of the other House.

Mr. MORGAN. I will state to the Senator that I got the estimate yesterday from the Printing Office that 5,000 copies would cost $1,000, and so the State Department have informed me this morning.

Mr. MORRILL. Then, if the Senator is satisfied about that, I see no objection to his proposition.

Mr. MORGAN. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. MORRILL. The information which has been obtained through the State Department from our consuls abroad has been more valuable than almost anything else that we have been called upon to publish. There is one reform that ought to be instituted when these volumes are sent to Senators and members; they ought to be either in wrappers or envelopes so that Senators and members of the House may have nothing to do but to direct them. I understand the appropriation was so stinted that there have not been funds for the proper wrapping or inclosing of the documents ordered to be printed. As they are now sent out, I fear that very many of them are never distributed by members because they have not the proper envelopes or paper and paste and time to put them in shape to be sent out. I think that is a matter which should be reformed at the State Department, or they should be sent to the folding-rooms of the Senate and House so that they may be properly inclosed, leaving Senators and members nothing to do but to direct them.

I hope that the proposition of the Senator from Alabama will receive unanimous consent.

Mr. ANTHONY. The statute requires that the resolution should go to the Committee on Printing—not merely the rules of the Senate, but the statutes of the United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Alabama object to such a reference?

Mr. MORGAN. I have no objection. I will only ask that the committee will be somewhat active in regard to it, because the printers are proceeding to distribute the type, and every day we delay will add to the expense of printing the additional copies.

Mr. ANTHONY. I have no disposition to take jurisdiction of the matter, but the law requires it, and therefore I made the suggestion.

Mr. MORGAN. I thought this an exceptional case, inasmuch as Congress had virtually ordered the publication of this document, and as all we had to do was to print so many numbers by merely running the paper through the press, I thought it would not fall within the rule.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Revised Statutes require that whenever extra copies are proposed to be ordered of any document, the resolution ordering them shall be sent to the Committee on Printing of the House in which the motion is made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is true.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Let the resolution go to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. MORGAN. Then I will ask the reference in the hope that the committee will act upon it promptly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to refer the resolution to the Committee on Printing.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY subsequently reported the resolution from the Committee on Printing; and it was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT FROM MONDAY TO FRIDAY NEXT.

On motion of Mr. SHERMAN, it was Ordered, That when the Senate adjourns on Monday it be to meet on Friday next.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. GARLAND. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After fifty minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at one o'clock and fifteen minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

MONDAY, October 17, 1881.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last was read and approved.

A message, in writing, was received from the President of the United States by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. TELLER. I ask the Senate to relieve me from further service on the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Colorado moves that he be excused from service upon the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The motion was agreed to.

ALLEGED TREASURY IRREGULARITIES.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I ask the attention of the Senate to the resolution I offered on Friday last, if it is the pleasure of the Senate to consider it now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be taken up unless there be objection. The Chair hears none, and the resolution is before the Senate.

The Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution, submitted by Mr. SHERMAN on the 14th instant:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to transmit to the Senate a copy of the report of James F. Meline and others made to the Treasury Department during the recess of the Senate, and of any papers received by him based upon such report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the resolution.

Mr. FARLEY. I ask the Senator from Ohio to postpone the consideration of the resolution at this time, saying to him that we shall be ready to take it up some time during the present session, probably by the latter part of the week. I am informed that this report is not a full report; and the question involved is one that the country, as well as those who instituted the investigation, is interested in. I ask the Senator to consent that the resolution go over temporarily.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not think there is now the least objection to the passage of the resolution; but as a matter of course I do not wish to interpose an objection to postponing its consideration if that course is desired by the Senate. I will say to the Senator from California that the public interests will not be affected by the passage of the resolution.

Mr. FARLEY. I will say to the Senator from Ohio that at the meeting of the Senate after the recess, the latter part of this week, I shall interpose no objection to taking up the resolution; but at this time I ask him to consent to its going over.

Mr. SHERMAN. This report, as I understand, is a report made by a committee of subordinate officers to the Secretary of the Treasury containing information intended for his personal action, and he has acted upon the report; but the newspapers have in some way magnified the report, publishing various suspicions and conjectures and innuendoes. Under these circumstances I think it is but just to the officers who are referred to in the report that it should be published. However, if the Senator wishes to postpone the consideration of the resolution until Friday next, I can make no objection, but I see no reason for such postponement.

Mr. FARLEY. I make the motion to postpone the consideration of the resolution until Friday next.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio does not object, the Chair understands?

Mr. SHERMAN. No; if that is the desire of the Senator I have no objection, but I shall insist upon having the resolution acted upon at the present session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution is before the Senate, and the Senator from California moves to postpone it until Friday next. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORT ON COTTON-GOODS TRADE.

Mr. MORRILL submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That 2,500 additional extra copies of the report of the Secretary of State, now in press, upon "The Cotton-Goods Trade of the World," be printed for the use of the Senate.

STANDING COMMITTEES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair, in pursuance of the resolution of the senior Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] authorizing him to fill up vacancies upon the standing committees, makes the following announcement, which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is proper to state that the Chair understood in filling these vacancies he was not to designate any person as chairman of a committee. Mr. Burnside was chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations and Mr. Conkling was chairman of the Committee on Commerce. Of course the Chair did not intend to make any appointment of these gentlemen to their places as chairmen. The Chair was told by some gentlemen of the Senate familiar with the rules that it is the custom for the Chair simply to fill vacancies and then the committee takes charge of the matter and selects its chairman.

Mr. MORRILL. I suggest to the Chair that the new appointees of course take their places at the foot of the committees.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so ordered, if there is any question about it, that the new members now appointed will take their places at the foot of the list.

FRIDAY, October 21, 1881.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Monday last was read and approved.

A message, in writing, was received from the President of the United States by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries.

SENATE DISBURSEMENTS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury in response to Senate resolution of the 14th instant relating to the payment or disbursement of money from the Treasury appropriated for the payment of Senators, the officers and employés of the Senate, and the contingent expenses of the Senate, &c.; which, on motion of Mr. SHERMAN, was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

NEW YORK SENATORIAL ELECTIONS.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I hold in my hand a petition signed by members of the Legislature of the State of New York relating to the title of Senators MILLER and LAPHAM to seats in the Senate. I am requested to present the same to the Senate; and I move its reference to the Committee on Privileges and Elections together with a like petition presented by me on a former occasion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator desire to have the petition read?

Mr. MCPHERSON. I do not desire to have it read. Let it be printed and referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections together with the other petition I presented on the first day of the present session.

Mr. INGALLS. Why print them? It is not usual to print petitions, Mr. President; and I can see no reason for departing from that rule in this case.

Mr. MCPHERSON. There is no occasion for printing the petitions for they are in print. Let them be referred as they are.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that the petition just presented, with the one formerly presented by the Senator from New Jersey, be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. The question is on that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

ALLEGED TREASURY IRREGULARITIES.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution submitted by me a few days ago.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio moves to take up the resolution submitted by him on the 14th instant. It will be taken up unless there is objection to that procedure. The Chair hears no objection, and the resolution is before the Senate.

The Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution, submitted by Mr. SHERMAN on the 14th instant:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to transmit to the Senate a copy of the report of James F. Meline and others made to the Treasury Department during the recess of the Senate, and of any papers received by him based upon such report.

Mr. FARLEY. Mr. President, I stated the other day that I should have no objection to the resolution coming up on this day for consideration. I understand that it relates to an investigation ordered by the Treasury Department without any authority of Congress whatever, and I cannot very well see what Congress has to do with the report. It was made by a commission appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury himself, without any motion on the part of any one in the Congress of the United States. I do not see what this extraordinary session has to do with such a report. I should like to hear from the Senator from Ohio in reference to that point. It seems to me that the Senate has nothing to do with it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I stated, on introducing this resolution, that the investigation was one of a character not usually communicated to Congress, but that certain public prints had contained unfounded imputations against several officers of the Government, and that there was something in the report which reflected on a member of this body formerly a Cabinet officer. Under the circumstances, as I was plainly the person referred to, having been Secretary of the Treasury at the time stated, I deemed it my right as well as my duty to my fellow-Senators to call out this information. If the statements contained in the papers be true, they are proper matters for the Senate to examine in every sense.

Mr. President, I have been accustomed to newspaper abuse all my life and very rarely notice it. This is probably the first time in my political life that I have ever read to this body a newspaper attack upon me or upon any one else; but when any paper or any man impugns in the slightest degree my official integrity I intend to have it investigated, and I wish it tested not only by the law but by the strictest rules of personal honor.

For this reason, when this imputation is made by a leading and prominent paper that there is on the files of the Treasury Department a document which reflects upon me, I think it right that it should be published to the world, and then the Senate can investigate it with the power to send for persons and papers. That is the only reason why I offered the resolution, and not so much in my own defense as in defense of those accused in this document. If the accusation is true it is the duty of the Senate to examine into the matter.

Mr. FARLEY. I had never seen the article referred to by the Senator from Ohio, and I did not know that any reflection had been cast upon that Senator by any newspaper article. This is the first time I have ever heard of that.

If the report has to come to this body at all, if this body has any jurisdiction over it, it being an ex parte report entirely, I suggest that the testimony taken before the commission appointed to make this investigation be also submitted with the report of the commission appointed to make the investigation. It appears to me that it would be entirely proper that the testimony taken before the commission should be sent up with the report. As it is a report authorized, not by Congress, but by the Treasury Department, as I understand, the testimony taken therewith would be entirely proper to be sent up with the report. I therefore move to amend the resolution so as to include the testimony taken before the investigating commission.

Mr. SHERMAN. The amendment of the Senator from California would involve the Senate in an unusual and remarkable proceeding. The information upon which this report is founded is not information obtained under oath with the sanction of law. There is no power to administer an oath in these cases. It is founded probably upon passing rumor, somewhat upon written statement, somewhat upon affidavits, made without the sanction of a legal oath. The Senate is too just a body to call forth and make public the class of information which is communicated every day to every Department of the Government. When the report which was made by subordinate officers of the Government shall come before the Senate, if the Senate then by its committee sees in that report anything that is necessary to be examined into, it will be its duty to make such examination. Senators may then see what foundation there is for accusation; and they may call before them witnesses and examine and cross-examine them; but the Senate I trust will never make itself the means of publishing mere scandal and ex parte statements that have been communicated to subordinate officers of the Treasury Department. When the report is made, the Senate can then examine the matter according to the rules of evidence, giving parties accused an opportunity to be heard, with the right to cross-examine witnesses and to administer an oath legally to parties who make these accusations.

I trust, therefore, that this amendment, which I believe is unexampled, to call out such a class of information, will not be added to this resolution, but that the report itself, which is made the basis of these newspaper attacks, may be published; and then if there is anything further that the Senate wish to examine about they can do it and guard at the same time the rights of private persons.

Mr. FARLEY. I have no feeling in this matter one way or another; but it had been suggested by some Senators, by one at least on the other side of the Chamber, that this report having been made by parties appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury the testimony ought to accompany the report, for the reason that if charges have been made against the Senator or others, the testimony would show that those charges were totally unfounded. I submit to the Senator from Ohio whether the testimony would not accomplish the very object that he seeks here, to remove the impressions which have been made by the public prints?

Mr. SHERMAN. What testimony is there? How can there be testimony in the legal sense of that word?

Mr. FARLEY. Could there be a report made without testimony? I understood the Senator to say that testimony was taken before this commission?

Mr. SHERMAN. What does the Senator mean by the word "testimony?" Does he mean the statement of a man who swears before a legal officer having the power to administer an oath? If so, then there is no testimony in this case.

Mr. FARLEY. If the parties who were appointed to make this investigation were not legally appointed, then we have nothing to do with their proceedings.

Mr. SHERMAN. They were legally appointed.

Mr. FARLEY. Then if they were legally appointed they were authorized to administer oaths.

Mr. SHERMAN. Not at all; that does not follow.

Mr. FARLEY. Then what could they base a report upon? Would it not be based upon testimony taken before the commission?

Mr. SHERMAN. Does not my friend from California know that the head of a Department examines into every complaint that is made, whether it be communicated verbally or in writing or in any form whatever? It may be even by innuendo; it may be even by an anonymous communication; but any information that is brought before him he has the right, and it is his duty, to examine into. But would any Senator spread before the public at large such communications made in this informal way? Why, sir, it has never been done. The Senate is too grave, too just, and too dignified a body to thus publish these reports. I do not know that there is any such information, for I do not know anything about it; but I say that I never would call for information of that kind.

Mr. FARLEY. The Senator says he calls for this report for the purpose of removing the impressions which have been made by the public prints, and I say, in order to do that effectually the testimony, in my judgment, would be necessary to that end. I do not know anything about the testimony; I do not know what it is; I never saw the report; and I never saw the articles in the newspapers which have been referred to by the honorable Senator from Ohio; but it strikes me that to accomplish the object the Senator has in view, to remove these impressions, if improper impressions have been made, the testimony taken before this commission would be proper to be sent up together with the report. I submit the matter; I have no feeling about it at all, but it seems to me the very object the Senator from Ohio seeks would be better accomplished by having the facts as taken before this commission sent to this body with the report which he now seeks to obtain by the resolution.

Mr. MORRILL. I think that we had better have the report printed first, and examine that and see whether there are any grave matters that ought to be further investigated. If there are, I shall certainly vote to investigate them; but this raking around through every Department to find if there are not some persons who will propagate scandal is a thing I certainly think it would be rather beneath the dignity of the Senate to lend its aid and assistance to. We may take the history of English statesmen for the last hundred years and read the correspondence that is published in their biographies, and we will find nearly every one of them set down as rascals—as men who would do almost anything for gain!

For one, I am not in the habit of taking much stock, so to say, in these constant rumors about the corruption of the War Department or of the Interior Department or of any of the Departments. I think we had better have some solid foundation before we publish to the world a lot of unauthenticated scandal.

Mr. DAWES. No one will shrink from any charge which the Senator from California will take the responsibility to make; but the charge which renders this call proper and which has prompted it is that there is something in a report made to the Secretary of the Treasury reflecting upon his predecessor, now a Senator in this body, and the Senator calls for the report which it is charged contains this damaging reflection. It is met by the Senator from California with a suggestion that something else be produced. Let that which is charged to be damaging to any Senator in this body be produced here, and if it calls for any further investigation or any further production of papers, no one will be slow to call for their production.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] moves that a copy of the report which James F. Meline has made to the Treasury Department be furnished to this body. The Senator from California [Mr. FARLEY] moves to add "together with the testimony taken in connection therewith." The question is upon the amendment offered by the Senator from California. Is the Senate ready for the question? Senators, as many as are in favor of the amendment proposed by the Senator from California will say "ay." [Putting the question.] By the sound the Chair is in doubt. The ayes will please rise.

There were, on a division—ayes 22, noes 26.

Mr. FARLEY. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BUTLER, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] on all political questions. If this is a political question, I shall feel constrained to withhold my vote. I should like the Senator's colleague [Mr. INGALLS] to state whether he thinks such a question is a political one.

Mr. INGALLS. I can tell better whether it is political after the roll-call has closed.

Mr. BUTLER. Then I shall withhold my vote for the present.

Mr. DAWES, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. LAMAR] on all questions upon which we should vote on opposite sides. I do not know how he would consider this vote. I shall withhold my vote, however.

Mr. GARLAND, (when his name was called.) I am paired generally with the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.] If he were here I should vote "yea" upon this proposition, but I shall withhold my vote.

Mr. GORMAN, (when Mr. GROOME's name was called.) My colleague [Mr. GROOME] is paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. MITCHELL] on political questions.

Mr. HILL, of Colorado, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. WALKER] on all political questions. As this question seems to have taken that turn, I shall not vote.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Maine, [Mr. FRYE.] If he were here I should vote "yea."

Mr. MITCHELL, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. GROOME.]

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. SAUNDERS. My colleague [Mr. VAN WYCK] is paired with the Senator from Oregon, [Mr. GROVER.]

Mr. BUTLER. I beg to announce my pair with the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. PLUMB.] If he were present I should vote "yea."

Mr. DAWES. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. HOAR] and the Senator from Virginia [Mr. JOHNSTON] are paired.

Mr. LOGAN, (after having voted in the negative.) I wish to withdraw my vote. I did not notice that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. RANSOM] was absent. He and I are paired for a few days when either is absent, and I ask to withdraw my vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The vote of the Senator from Illinois will be withdrawn.

Mr. FERRY, (after having voted in the negative.) I discover by the vote that there is a political division of the Senate, and the question being a political one, as I am paired with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] on political questions, I withdraw my vote.

Mr. BLAIR. I wish to announce the pair of my colleague [Mr. ROLLINS] with the Senator from Florida, [Mr. JONES.]

Mr. BECK, (after having voted in the affirmative.) I voted "yea" a little while ago thinking the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] was in his seat. I observe he did not vote, and therefore I ask leave to withdraw my vote. I am paired with him upon all political questions, and this seems to have taken that shape.

The result was announced—yeas 21, nays 23; as follows:

YEAS—21.

Bayard,	Davis of W. Va.,	Jackson,	Slater,
Brown,	Farley,	Jonas,	Vest,
Call,	George,	McPherson,	Williams.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GARLAND. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Ohio to the phraseology of his resolution:

That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to transmit to the Senate a copy of the report of James F. Meline and others made to the Treasury Department during the recess of the Senate, and of any papers received by him based upon such report.

It is to the latter part of the sentence that I call the attention of the Senator from Ohio. It would seem to presuppose that the report had been made public in some way or other and that some papers had come to the Secretary of the Treasury based upon the report. Am I correct in that interpretation?

Mr. SHERMAN. I am not apprised as to the facts. I only know the ordinary course would be that the report would be submitted to any officer whose conduct was criticised and who would be allowed to file his answer. That would be the ordinary way, without any testimony. I do not know whether that was done in this case or not.

Mr. GARLAND. That is the idea the Senator had, then, in using that language?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes; that is if any person has been accused there, no doubt the Secretary of the Treasury would give him a chance to explain so far as he chose. I do not know whether that has been done or not, but I presume it has been, because that is the usual course.

Mr. GARLAND. The right of a Senator when he claims in his seat an investigation of himself, or his conduct, or of any insinuations upon him or any officials in this body, is unrestricted, and I am the last man in the world to desire to interfere with it either as to the time of that investigation or as to the mode and manner in which it shall proceed; but I wish to suggest to the Senator that, in addition to this, I think it would be well for the Secretary to transmit also to the Senate all the papers upon which this report is based. I recognize the distinction which the Senator drew a few moments ago as to the question of testimony, strictly speaking in a legal aspect; but, waiving that for the time, if there are any papers upon which this report is based, or upon which the report is supposed to have been made, I think it is well that those papers should come in for what they are worth. I make the suggestion to the Senator from Ohio, not desiring in the least to interfere in the matter, but to give him the fullest investigation, that these words be incorporated at the end of the sentence: "and also any papers upon which such report is founded."

Mr. SHERMAN. Personally I would say make it as broad as you choose, but I can see that letters, even anonymous letters, and slips from newspapers, statements made without the sanction of oath, or statements made under oath without the sanction of law, which are just as bad, and all sorts of communications that may be made in the administration of the Treasury Department, would be communicated under the amendment suggested by the Senator from Arkansas. I do not think it would be just to do so. Personally I do not care how much they send in of all kinds of papers, but I do not think it is just or right for the Senate to publish about any man, high or low, poor or rich, whatever may be his condition, any communication which is not something in the nature of an accusation that he can answer. That is the rule.

Therefore I must confess my surprise to see a vote of the Senate asked which may call for communications of an anonymous character or for slips from the public prints in a thousand forms. If there is any voucher, any public document or anything of that kind, or if the statements made by the report should be of such a character as to induce the Senate to look further into the matter, then as a matter of course there will be an opportunity to get any kind of proper testimony and to get the basis of these accusations, &c.

All I desire to call out is the report itself upon which the public comments have been made, and which it was said was suppressed by the Secretary of the Treasury. I know that the Secretary of the Treasury did not suppress this report any more than a thousand such reports have been suppressed by every head of every Department. That is, these reports are sent to him or to his subordinates, examined in a cursory way, and he has acted upon them, and it is not usual to communicate them to Congress. While there may be some force in the objection made by the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] that this report ought not to be communicated to Congress simply because it is not of sufficient dignity for the Senate to examine it, I do not think so. I think when a report is made to the head of a Department impugning or criticising in any way the conduct of any officer of the Government, it is proper for public information; but to go back of that and inquire into the basis of that report might do great injustice. Surely the Senate could have no motive to do injustice in this case.

I think, therefore, it would not be wise to extend the resolution beyond its present limits, and if the Senator desires it, after he sees the report, he can get any further information which he thinks it proper for the Senate to know. I do not choose to resist any motion made to extend the inquiry, but I will vote against it simply because I do not want to do injustice to anybody.

Mr. GARLAND. I shall not insist upon amending the resolution, because I want it to suit the Senator from Ohio. As I said before, I recognize to the fullest extent his right, and possibly his duty, under the circumstances, to have this investigation and to have it in the way that he desires; but now, to make myself perfectly understood, suppose the report comes in here and states that the investigator finds that a certain thing was done or should have been done, and that is based upon a statement made by Mr. A in writing or Mr. B, or by a letter from Mr. A or Mr. B. That report, in my judgment, is incomplete without such letter or statement or whatever it may be. That is the point that I make, because in the investigation the person who makes this report, it might be found out, had mistaken the conclusion of the letter or statement or anonymous letter, if you please, or anonymous statement, as the case might be. It is with a view of going directly to these facts and knowing precisely what we are proceeding upon that I have made the suggestion; but if the Senator from Ohio does not desire it, of course I shall not attempt to amend his own resolution, which he has a right to offer, and which it was his duty, I think, under the circumstances, to offer.

Mr. SHERMAN. One word more; I am sorry to detain the Senate so long about the matter, but I will say this: let any Senator who desires it make a motion (as a matter of course I could not make it myself) to raise a committee of investigation or that one of the standing committees of the Senate should investigate the matter. I have not felt at liberty to do it, because I could not, as a matter of course, act on such a committee, and I have taken this mode in order to meet the point that has been made. Then if the Senate choose to examine further they can do so.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is the Senate ready for the question on agreeing to the resolution of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN?]

The resolution was agreed to.

LADIES' RETIRING-ROOM.

Mr. HARRIS submitted the following resolution; which was read:

Resolved, That the Architect of the Capitol be, and hereby is, instructed to cause the room at the north gallery of the Senate Chamber, now used as the ladies' retiring-room, to be converted into two rooms for the use of committees; and that the room on the basement floor of the Senate wing, now occupied by the Committee on Civil Service, be fitted up for and to be used hereafter as the ladies' retiring-room.

Mr. HARRIS. I move the reference of the resolution to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. I beg to invoke the very early attention of that committee to it; and when in session I should like to go before the committee and explain the reasons why the resolution should be adopted, the prominent one of which is that there are two or three committees of this body who have no committee-room, and I think the arrangement suggested being approved by the Architect of the Capitol, the Sergeant-at-Arms, and others, the propriety of it will be perfectly obvious to the committee when the reasons are explained to them. I hope that the committee will at the very earliest hour possible assemble so that the matter may be explained.

Mr. HAWLEY. I think the Senator from Tennessee has made a slight mistake in the wording of his resolution. He refers to a room as occupied by the Committee on Civil Service. I suppose he intends the room that committee formerly occupied on the west side of the north and south corridor. The present room of the Committee on Civil Service is simply the rear or east room of the Committee on Public Lands. The Senator does not refer to that room, I suppose?

Mr. HARRIS. I would state to the Senator from Connecticut that at my request the resolution was drafted by the Architect of the Capitol. The Senator is perhaps right, and it is the room formerly occupied by that committee, but be that as it may, the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds will correct any error, if there be one, in describing the room. That committee will be requested to go and look at the room, and it will be properly described. The committee will correct any mistake, if there be one, in the resolution.

Mr. DAWES. It is proposed to have the resolution referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. HARRIS. My motion is to refer it. I do not ask for the action of the Senate upon the resolution, but that it be referred and considered by the committee, and I was begging the committee to take very prompt action upon the resolution, and it will report it back adversely or favorably as it thinks proper.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] to refer the resolution which he has submitted to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORT ON COTTON-GOODS TRADE.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. President, I am instructed by the Committee on Printing, to which was referred a resolution to print 2,500 additional extra copies of the report of the Secretary of State upon "The Cotton-Goods Trade of the World," to report it back and ask to be discharged from its further consideration. The document is a very valuable one and the committee are in favor of a much larger publication than this; but we have already exhausted the authority of the law by ordering as many as can be printed for $500, and to repeat that order would seem to be an evasion of the law. The Senator from Alabama, [Mr. MORGAN,] who introduced the first resolution for the printing of this document, is a first-rate lawyer and I am none at all. If he has anything to say on the subject, I should like to have it said.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Committee on Printing ask to be discharged from the further consideration of a resolution which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution submitted by Mr. MORRILL on the 17th instant, as follows:

Resolved, That 2,500 additional extra copies of the report of the Secretary of State, now in press, upon "The Cotton-Goods Trade of the World," be printed for the use of the Senate.

Mr. MORGAN. The committee ought to be discharged, no doubt.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the committee will be discharged. The Chair hears no objection, and that order is made.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. FERRY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After thirty-eight minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at one o'clock and twenty-five minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

LIST OF DEPARTMENT PUBLICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the communication, as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, October 20, 1881.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of Senate resolution of the 24th of March last, reading as follows:

"Resolved, That the heads of each of the Executive Departments be, and hereby are, directed to report to the Senate, at the beginning of the next session of Congress, complete lists of any and all books, reports, documents, and pamphlets issued, printed, or published by their respective Departments, and by each and every bureau and officer thereof, from March 4, 1789, to March 4, 1881."

The records of this Department fail to give the information called for, as it is within a short time only that steps have been taken to preserve in consecutive order the various reports, documents, pamphlets, circulars, &c., issued therefrom.

A careful search through the State papers developes the fact that probably every important report or letter has been preserved in that collection, especially those referring to the financial and revenue operations of the Government.

Very respectfully,

W. WINDOM, Secretary.

To the PRESIDENT pro tempore of the Senate of the United States.

Mr. COCKRELL. Are there any accompanying papers with that communication?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There are none.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the communication lie upon the table and be printed. It is in answer to a resolution that was passed at my instance at the last session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The communication will lie on the table and be printed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After two hours and four minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at two o'clock and sixteen minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

MONDAY, October 24, 1881.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last was read and approved.

A message, in writing, was received from the President of the United States by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries.

ALLEGED TREASURY IRREGULARITIES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following communication; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table and be printed:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., October 22, 1881.

SIR: I am in receipt of the resolution of the Senate of the 21st instant, as follows:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to transmit to the Senate a copy of the report of James F. Meline and others made to the Treasury Department duriog the recess of the Senate, and of any papers received by him based upon such report."

In reply thereto I have the honor to transmit herewith a copy of the report called for, with the accompanying statements of Mr. J. K. Upton and J. T. Power, who occupied the position of chief clerk and ex officio superintendent of the Treasury building for the period covered by the report.

Soon after assuming the duties of Secretary of the Treasury my attention was called to alleged abuses in disbursement of the contingent fund of the Department which was under the immediate charge of a custodian, and under the general supervision of the chief clerk of the Department, and I appointed a committee to look into the matter, as had been the custom of the Department in such cases. The law, somewhat conflicting in its terms in relation to the relative duties of these two officers, will be found fully set forth in the report. On considering the report I became convinced that certain irregularities and abuses existed in this branch of the service, and as I had some doubts as to the legality of the appointment of a custodian I abolished that office June 17, 1881, and by general order of July 1, 1881, reorganized the office.

A copy of this order is herewith transmitted, from which it will appear that all the changes necessary to a complete and thorough correction of the irregularities and abuses referred to have been adopted.

It was my intention, as my more pressing public duties would permit, to have pursued this general policy in other branches of the Treasury, by the appointment of competent committees to collect the necessary data on which to base proper action to secure economy and promote the best interests of the public service, but the assassination of the President suspended further action in this direction.

Very respectfully,

WILLIAM WINDOM, Secretary.

Hon. DAVID DAVIS, President of the Senate.

SENATE DISBURSEMENTS.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary to make a report upon a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury of the 17th instant in response to a Senate resolution of the 14th instant calling for certain information touching the methods and authority under which moneys have been disbursed for the payment of the salaries and compensation of Senators and officers of the Senate since the death of Mr. Burch. The Committee on the Judiciary was instructed to take this communication into consideration. The committee have considered it, but have not had the time to come to a final and definitive opinion upon the questions of law embraced in the transaction; but we have examined the subject far enough, I am instructed to say, to be of opinion that the present method of disbursement of the moneys appropriated for the expenses of the Senate, is, to say the least of it, open to extreme doubt in regard to its legality. We are all agreed that it is very doubtful, to say the least, whether the law will warrant the method that has been practiced since the death of Mr. Burch; and the committee were all of opinion that it was desirable we should report that conclusion so far to the Senate in order that the Senate might, if it chose, relieve itself of any acquiescence in this method of proceeding as lawful, by taking some steps to supply, for the time being or otherwise, the existing vacancy, so that the moneys appropriated for these purposes may be drawn in a way that we all agree is clearly lawful.

That ends what I am authorized to report from the committee—to call the attention of the Senate to the subject and to express what I have in behalf of the committee as to the doubtfulness of the present method.

The report was agreed to.

ELECTION OF ACTING SECRETARY.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now, Mr. President, on my own individual responsibility as a Senator, and acting for no committee or no party or anybody else but myself, I offer a resolution, which I ask may be read, and then it may lie over for consideration, for aught I care.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That Francis E. Shober, the Chief Clerk of the Senate, be and he is hereby appointed acting Secretary of the Senate until the vacancy caused by the death of John C. Burch, late Secretary of the Senate, shall be filled; and that said acting secretary be and he is hereby empowered to do and perform all official acts pertaining to the office of Secretary of the Senate and under the same responsibilities and after giving an official bond as such acting secretary.

Mr. PENDLETON. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] anticipated a resolution which I had upon my table to the same effect and almost in the same words as the resolution that he has offered. I hope that the Senate will consider it immediately and that it may be passed without a division.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio asks for the consideration of the resolution proposed by the Senator from Vermont appointing Mr. Francis E. Shober, the Chief Clerk of the Senate, to act as Secretary until the vacancy caused by the death of Mr. John C. Burch shall be filled. Senators, are you ready for the question? ["Question."] As many as favor the resolution will say "ay." [Putting the question.] The resolution is adopted unanimously.

On motion of Mr. EDMUNDS, it was Ordered, That the President of the United States and the Secretary of the Treasury be notified of the election of Mr. Francis E. Shober, Chief Clerk, as acting Secretary of the Senate.

OFFICIAL REGISTER.

Mr. ANTHONY submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That 500 additional copies of the first volume of the Official Register, now in press, be printed and bound in cloth, for the use of the Senate.

INTEROCEANIC CANAL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the President of the United States, transmitting, in response to a Senate resolution of the 14th instant, a report of the Secretary of State on the action taken by the Government since the adjournment of the last Congress toward protecting the rights and interests of the United States in the projected interoceanic canal at Panama.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the communication be printed, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BECK. Would there be any objection to having the communication published in the RECORD? I hope not, for it is a very important one, I understand, and otherwise we may not see it for a good while.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have no objection.

Mr. BECK. If there is no objection, let it be published in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and the communication will be printed in the RECORD.

The communication is as follows:

To the Senate:

I transmit herewith the report of the Secretary of State in answer to the resolution of the Senate of October 14th, with accompanying document.

CHESTER A. ARTHUR.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, October 22, 1881.

To the President:

The following resolution of the Senate has by your order been referred to this Department:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
October 14, 1881.

Resolved, That the President be requested, if not in his judgment incompatible with the public interest, to advise the Senate whether any action has been taken by the Government since the adjournment of the last Congress towards protecting the rights and interests of the United States in the projected interoceanic canal at Panama.

Attest:

F. E. SHOBER,
Chief Clerk United States Senate.

In answer thereto the Secretary of State has the honor to report that having learned since the adjournment of Congress of the rejection by Colombia of the protocol negotiated by the representatives of the United States and that republic, which it was hoped would secure a treaty satisfactory to both, and being informed by the minister of the United States in Colombia that the Government of Colombia by its public acts was avowing its desire to terminate the treaty of 1846 and appeal to the powers of Europe for a joint guarantee of the neutrality of the Isthmus and the sovereignty of Colombia, this Department addressed the following letter of instruction to the United States minister in London.

An identic note was sent to each of the American ministers in Europe.

Very respectfully,

JAMES G. BLAINE.

No. 187.] DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, June 24, 1881.

SIR: It has fallen under the observation of the President, through the current statements of the European press, and other usual channels of communication, that the great powers of Europe may possibly be considering the subject of jointly guaranteeing the neutrality of the interoceanic canal now projected across the Isthmus of Panama.

The United States recognizes a proper guarantee of neutrality as essential to the construction and successful operation of any highway across the Isthmus of Panama, and more than a third of a century ago this Government took every step that is deemed requisite in the premises. The necessity was foreseen and abundantly provided for long in advance of any possible call for the actual exercise of power.

In 1846 a memorable and important treaty was negotiated and signed between the United States of America and the Republic of New Grenada, now the United States of Colombia. By the thirty-fifth article of that treaty, in exchange for certain concessions made to the United States, we guaranteed "positively and efficaciously" the perfect neutrality of the Isthmus and of any interoceanic communications that might be constructed upon or over it for the maintenance of free transit from sea to sea; and we also guaranteed the rights of sovereignty and property of the United States of Colombia over the territory of the Isthmus as included within the borders of the State of Panama.

In the judgment of the President this guarantee given by the United States of America does not require re-enforcement or accession or assent from any other power. In more than one instance this Government has been called upon to vindicate the neutrality thus guaranteed, and there is no contingency now foreseen or apprehended in which such vindication would not be within the power of this nation.

There has never been the slightest doubt on the part of the United States as to the purpose or extent of the obligation then assumed by which it became surety alike for the free transit of the world's commerce over whatever landway or waterway might be opened from sea to sea, and for the protection of the territorial rights of Colombia from aggression or interference of any kind. Nor has there ever been room to question the full extent of the advantages and benefits naturally due to its geographical position and political relations on the Western Continent, which the United States obtained from the owner of the Isthmian territory in exchange for that far-reaching and responsible guarantee.

If the foreshadowed action of the European powers should assume tangible shape it would be well for you to bring to the notice of Lord Granville the provisions of the treaty of 1846 and especially of its thirty-fifth article, and to intimate to him that any movement in the sense of supplementing the guarantee contained therein would necessarily be regarded by this Government as an uncalled for intrusion into a field where the local and general interests of the United States of America must be considered before those of any other power, save those of the United States of Colombia alone, which has already derived and will continue to derive such eminent advantages from the guarantee of this Government.

The President deems it due to frankness to be still more explicit on this subject and to elucidate the views of the United States Government with somewhat of detail to the end that no uncertainty shall subsist as to the integrity of our motives or the distinctness of our aims.

It is not the wish or the purpose of the United States to interfere with any commercial enterprise in which the citizens or subjects of any foreign power may see fit to embark under a lawful privilege. The fact of the stock and franchises of the Panama Canal or the Panama Railway being owned in Europe either in whole or principally is no more a subject of complaint on the part of the United States than is the circumstance that the stock of many of its own great lines of railway is largely held abroad. Such ownership, with its attendant rights, is in the United States amply secured by the laws of the land and on the Isthmus is doubly secured by the local laws of Colombia with the superadded guarantee of the United States.

Nor in times of peace does the United States seek to have any exclusive privileges accorded to American ships in respect to precedence or tolls through an interoceanic canal any more than it has sought like privileges for American goods in transit over the Panama Railway under the exclusive control of an American corporation. The extent of the privileges of American citizens and ships is measurable under the treaty of 1846 by those of Colombian citizens and ships. It would be our earnest desire and expectation to see the world's peaceful commerce enjoy the same just, liberal, and national treatment.

It is as regards the political control of such a canal as distinguished from its merely administrative or commercial regulation that the President feels called upon to speak with directness and with emphasis. During any war in which the United States of America or the United States of Colombia might be a party, the passage of armed vessels of a hostile nation through the canal at Panama would be no more admissible than would the passage of the armed forces of a hostile nation over the railway lines joining the Atlantic and Pacific shores of the United States or of Colombia. And the United States of America will insist upon her right to take all needful precautions against the possibility of the Isthmus transit being in any event used offensively against her interests upon the land or upon the sea.

The two republics between which the guarantee of neutrality and possession exists have analogous conditions with respect to their territorial extension. Both have a long line of coast on either ocean to protect as well as to improve. The possessions of the United States upon the Pacific coast are imperial in extent and of extraordinary growth. Even at their present stage of development they would supply the larger part of the traffic which would seek the advantages of the canal. The States of California and Oregon and the Territory of Washington, larger in area than England and France, produce for export more than a ton of wheat for each inhabitant, and the entire freights demanding water transportation eastward, already enormous, are augmenting each year with an accelerating ratio. While the population and products of the Pacific slope are thus increasing upon a vast scale, the railway system connecting the Gulf of Mexico with the interior and with the great lakes is being rapidly extended, thus affording additional facilities for enlarging the commerce that must seek the coast line to the Pacific of which the projected canal at Panama will form a part and be as truly a channel of communication between the Eastern and far Western States as our own transcontinental railways. It is the perception of this domestic function of the long-sought water-way between the two seas that border the Republic which has caused the project to be regarded as of vital importance by this Government. The history of the enterprise is marked from the outset by the numerous expeditions which have, from time to time, been sent out by the United States at large expense to explore the various routes and thus facilitate the work when the time should be ripe and the vast capital be forthcoming for the undertaking.

If the proposed canal were a channel of communication near to the countries of the Old World, and employed wholly, or almost wholly, by their commerce, it might very properly be urged that the influence of the European powers should be large and justly commensurate with their interests. With the exercise of such influence the United States could find no fault, especially if assured of equal participation in the peaceable enjoyment of the commercial facilities so afforded. The case, however, is here reversed, and an agreement between the European states to jointly guarantee the neutrality and, in effect, control the political character of a highway of commerce, remote from them and near to us, forming substantially a part of our coast line, and promising to become the chief means of transportation between our Atlantic and Pacific States, would be an extraordinary procedure, and would necessarily be viewed by this Government with the gravest concern.

The policy of the United States is one of peace and friendly intercourse with every government and people. This disposition is frankly avowed and is moreover abundantly shown in the fact that our armaments, by land and sea, are kept within such limits as to afford no ground for distrust or suspicion of menace to other nations. The agreement entered into by this Government in 1846 was manifestly in the interest of peace, and the necessity imposed by circumstances upon the United States of America to watch over a highway between its two coasts was so imperative that the resultant guarantee was the simplest justice to the chief interests concerned. Any attempt to supersede that guarantee by an agreement between European powers, which maintain vast armies and patrol the sea with immense fleets, and whose interest in the canal and its operation can never be so vital and supreme as ours, would partake of the nature of an alliance against the United States, and would be regarded by this Government as an indication of unfriendly feeling. It would be but an inadequate response to the good-will we bear them and to our cheerful and constant recognition of their own rights of domestic policy, as well as of those resulting from proximity or springing from neighborly interest.

The great European powers have repeatedly united in agreements such as guarantees of neutrality touching the political condition of States like Luxembourg, Belgium, Switzerland, and parts of the Orient, where the localities were adjacent, or where the interests involved concerned them nearly and deeply. Recognizing these facts, the United States has never offered to take part in such agreements or to make any agreements supplementary to them. While thus observing the strictest neutrality with respect to complications abroad, it is the long-settled conviction of this Government that any extension to our shores of the political system by which the great powers have controlled and determined events in Europe would be attended with danger to the peace and welfare of this nation.

While the Government of the United States has no intention of initiating any discussion upon this subject, it is proper that you should be prepared, in case of concerted action, or conference, or exchange of opinions thereon, between the great powers of Europe, to communicate to the Government to which you are accredited the views of the President as frankly and as fully as they are herein set forth. And at suitable times, in your personal and friendly intercourse with your colleagues of the diplomatic body, at London, you may find it proper to give discreet expression to the policy and motives of your Government in the premises.

You will be careful in any conversation you may have not to represent the position of the United States as the development of a new policy or the inauguration of any advanced, aggressive steps to be taken by this Government. It is nothing more than the pronounced adherence of the United States to principles long since enunciated by the highest authority of the Government, and now, in the judgment of the President, firmly inwoven as an integral and important part of our national policy. In his address upon taking the oath of office, the President distinctly proclaimed the position which the Government of the United States would hold upon this question, and if the European cabinets have failed to observe or give due heed to the declarations then made it may be well for you on some proper occasion to call the attention of the minister of foreign affairs to the language used by the President.

I am, sir, your obedient servant, JAMES G. BLAINE.

JAMES R. LOWELL, Esq., &c., &c., &c., London.

THE ROCHAMBEAU PAPERS.

Mr. SHERMAN, from the Committee on the Library, reported the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Librarian of Congress be authorized to receive and carefully preserve the papers of the Count de Rochambeau, general in the French army in America, a catalogue of which is now with the Librarian, to await the action of Congress on the proposal of the Marquis de Rochambeau to sell and convey such papers to the United States.

PAYMENT OF SALARIES.

Mr. VOORHEES submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay the salaries of the officers and employés of the Senate for the current month upon the adjournment of this special session of the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let that go over for the present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution goes over under the rule.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After two hours and fifty-eight minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at three o'clock and fifteen minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

TUESDAY, October 25, 1881.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

SWEARING IN OF ACTING SECRETARY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The oath of office will now be administered to the Acting Secretary of the Senate, who will present himself for that purpose.

The oath of office was administered by the President pro tempore to Mr. FRANCIS E. SHOBER, who was yesterday chosen Acting Secretary of the Senate.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask leave to move that the Secretary be instructed to transmit to the Commissioner of Pensions the affidavits and papers relating to the claim of Horace S. Spear for a pension, now on the files of the Secretary's office. The case was a pension case in the Department that was rejected. Then application was made to the Senate, supported by additional affidavits taken for use here, and the Senate passed a bill, which was not reached in the House of Representatives. Since that time the Pension Office, I understand, has reopened the case there, and I am advised by the Commissioner that the affidavits taken for use in the Senate may be used there if they can be transmitted. I therefore move that the Secretary be directed to transmit the papers.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There was no adverse report in the case?

Mr. EDMUNDS. It was an affirmative report, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order will be made.

On motion of Mr. RANSOM, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers in the claim of Edward H. Wilson be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, there being no adverse report.

THE ROCHAMBEAU PAPERS.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution reported by me yesterday from the Committee on the Library in regard to the papers of the Marquis de Rochambeau.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution reported by Mr. SHERMAN from the Committee on the Library on the 24th instant:

Resolved, That the Librarian of Congress be authorized to receive and carefully preserve the papers of the Count de Rochambeau, general in the French army in America, a catalogue of which is now with the Librarian, to await the action of Congress on the proposal of the Marquis de Rochambeau to sell and convey such papers to the United States.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, the purchase of the papers of the Count de Rochambeau, who commanded the land forces of the French in the Revolutionary War, has been under consideration for a number of years by the Committee on the Library. A proposition of that kind first came, I believe, through the minister of the United States to France, which I now hold in my hand. A catalogue of these papers was then furnished, some four years ago, which I also hold in my hand.

The Committee on the Library, I am informed, (I was not at that time a member of it,) has been uniformly in favor of the purchase of these papers; they are of very great value; but the committee thought that the purchase or any movement towards the purchase should be postponed until the papers themselves could be inspected, and the Marquis de Rochambeau was requested to send them to this country for inspection. Fortunately he was himself invited as the guest of the nation to attend the ceremonies at Yorktown, and he brought the papers here. They are now in this city. They have been carefully inspected by the Librarian of Congress, by several Senators and by other distinguished persons, and so far as I know every one who has inspected them appreciates their immense value and thinks that the Government of the United States ought without hesitation to become the owner of them.

The papers consist of about fourteen hundred original letters and military papers from the hands of Washington, Rochambeau, Montbarey, Lauzun, Vaudreuil, Tallmadge, Greene, Viomenil, and other French and American officers. Of these about fifty only out of the fourteen hundred have ever been published. The collection contains also the original letter-books of the Count de Rochambeau. It further embraces sixty-nine original maps drawn by engineers of the French army, representing numerous forts, battle-fields, camps, &c., occupied by the allied armies from Newport to Yorktown. The schedule is very full, and the catalogue has been compared with the original documents now in the city.

The Committee on the Library, feeling that they had no power to commit the Government to purchase this valuable property or to make any contract to bind the Government, agreed to report the resolution which I submitted yesterday, and which is now before the Senate. The facts in regard to the negotiations which have been had are much more familiar to the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. VOORHEES,] who was formerly chairman of the Committee on the Library, than to me.

I hope that the Senate will, without objection, adopt the resolution, which simply requests the Marquis de Rochambeau to leave the papers here in the possession of the Librarian of Congress to await the further action of Congress, without committing the Government to their purchase; but as a matter of course this request does involve to some extent an indication on the part of the Senate, if it adopts the resolution, that it will purchase the papers.

Mr. COCKRELL. Is there any estimate of their value?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes; the estimate put upon them is $20,000.

Mr. INGALLS. That is the usual sum!

Mr. COCKRELL. Would it be exactly right that the Senate should be committed to purchase papers costing that much without knowing anything about them?

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senate is not committed further than in the manner I have stated.

Mr. COCKRELL. I understood the Senator to say that the adoption of the resolution would be an admission of liability on the part of the Government to purchase the papers.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think unless we had some favor for the proposition of purchase we probably would not ask to have the papers left here. The papers are here and have been brought here at the request of the Committee on the Library; they are of immense value; and I think if the Senator himself would inspect them he would see the importance of the Government of the United States having these papers. I was very much impressed by them.

Mr. COCKRELL. Have the papers ever been examined by any committee?

Mr. SHERMAN. They have been examined by Senators, so far as they could examine them. Two members of the Committee on the Library are not here, but all the members of the committee are in favor of the purchase. The Librarian of Congress examined the papers very carefully, and we have a full catalogue of all the papers.

Mr. COCKRELL. I have no objection to the resolution provided there is no obligation, moral, legal, or equitable, on the part of the Senate to purchase these papers unless we shall think we want them when we come to examine them.

Mr. VOORHEES. I would be in favor of the resolution if there was the highest obligation, moral, equitable, and legal, implied in it to purchase these papers. For some two or three years the subject was before the Committee on the Library when I was chairman of it, and I became familiar with it. I regard these papers, embracing the correspondence of the parties to them, of inestimable value. They constitute a rich mine of historical literature. I also regard the price spoken of by the Senator from Ohio as very cheap for such papers. They have been examined by those in whose judgment I have more confidence than in my own, although I have given the subject as much attention as I could.

As to the scope of this resolution, I will say to Senators that these papers are here now in the possession of the Marquis de Rochambeau, who has visited this country under the invitation of the United States. When I learned that fact I was anxious that they should not be taken back to Europe. The Senate alone being in session, we were not prepared to take up the subject and purchase them. Consequently I labored somewhat to devise a method by which they might be retained in the United States until the two Houses of Congress were in session, when we could negotiate upon the subject. Of course we are not bound to any price by what we are doing now. At the same time, I am very free to declare that I for one should be willing to give the price indicated by the Marquis who has them in possession. Indeed he says, with the characteristic generosity on the part of that family toward the United States, that if he was able to do so he would be glad to make them a present to us. We ought not to accept them on any such basis. We are rich and powerful, and they contain a revelation of inside history that will be vastly interesting to the present generation and to future generations that will come after us. I regard it as most fortunate that the papers are here, as by this resolution we may retain them and take custody of them, and then bring the subject up when Congress meets and procure them for our use. I will only say this much at this stage of the proceedings.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I was once a member of the Committee on the Library and heard a good deal about the Rochambeau papers, and have been curious to see them. I should be inclined to vote at the proper time and in the proper way for the purchase of the papers at what, after a careful investigation, should be thought a fair price; but I should be glad to have the chairman of the Committee on the Library, or some other Senator, inform me where the Senate at its present session gets the authority to authorize the Librarian of Congress to do anything whatever. That is what I should like to be told. We have no control by law over the Librarian of Congress. We have no more right to authorize him, in my humble judgment—(I shall be glad to be corrected if I am wrong)—to receive these papers than we have to authorize him to receive the government bonds of one of the South American republics for safe-keeping, or any other property; and we have no more authority to authorize him to do it than any one or two of us would have if we met him down in the street. At least I am unable to see where we get any such power. He is not our officer.

I say this the more freely from the circumstance that I should be glad, for one, from what I have heard of these papers heretofore when a member of the Library Committee, to vote (if they turn out to be what they are represented,) a proper sum for their purchase; but my difficulty is that we are undertaking to do a thing in this form for which I know of no constitutional or lawful authority in this body. There is the trouble.

Undoubtedly under the direction of the Committee on the Library this gentleman can leave the papers in the custody of the Librarian as a private individual, representing security and all that, in this Capitol, which is supposed to be somewhat secure from fire; or certainly he might deposit them in the office of the Secretary of State for safe-keeping until the question of their purchase could be determined; but for this body, acting in its character as a body, to undertake to assume that it has the power and authority to authorize the Librarian to do anything, or not to do anything, either way, about it, I think would be a mistake in respect of our rights.

That is the thing that troubles me about it; and that is the only reason why I shall feel obliged, unless I get more light, to vote against the resolution in this form.

Mr. ANTHONY. I would suggest, in order to meet the constitutional objection of my friend, that the resolution be modified so that the Committee on the Library be authorized to receive and deposit these papers with the Librarian. The subject of purchasing these papers has been before the Senate for several years. I had the honor to introduce a resolution instructing the Committee on the Library to inquire into the expediency of their purchase. A very full catalogue has been furnished, but the Committee on the Library very properly desired to inspect the papers before making a recommendation with regard to their purchase. The papers are now here, and those Senators who have seen them, I among the number, find them among the most precious materials of American history. They certainly ought to belong to the archives of the Government. As the Senator from Indiana said, the Marquis de Rochambeau would be very willing, if he could afford it, to make a gift of these papers to the Government; but he cannot afford it, and it would not be becoming in us to accept them without compensation. I think if the resolution were modified in the way I have suggested it would overcome the objection of the Senator from Vermont, and I offer that amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY] will be read at the desk.

The ACTING SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend the resolution by striking out the words "Librarian of Congress" and inserting "Committee on the Library," and to insert after "receive" the words "and to deposit in the Library of Congress;" so as to read:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Library be authorized to receive and to deposit in the Library of Congress and carefully preserve the papers of the Count de Rochambeau, general in the French army in America, a catalogue of which is now with the Librarian, to await the action of Congress on the proposal of the Marquis de Rochambeau to sell and convey such papers to the United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] accept the amendment?

Mr. SHERMAN. I see no objection to it; the resolution will be the same. I will say, however, that there is this difficulty: the Committee on the Library is a joint committee and the members of it on the part of the House have not yet been named. I would move that the resolution refer to the Senate part of the Library Committee, if adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It being a Senate resolution the Chair supposes that it refers to the Committee on the Library here.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, after the explanation that has been made by the Senator from Ohio, the Senate may as well understand that if this resolution passes the Senate is committed to a proposition to purchase these papers for the sum of $20,000. That is the plain English of it, in black and white; it means that and nothing more; and if the Senate is prepared without any inspection of these papers, without any information of what they contain other than that which has been communicated by the statement of the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Rhode Island, to say that we will agree, so far as we are concerned, to pay the sum of $20,000 for these papers, then it is proper the resolution should pass; otherwise not.

The Senator from Rhode Island stated that the Marquis de Rochambeau would present these papers to the United States if he could afford to do it. That is an extraordinary attitude in which to place the guest of the nation at this time before the country. I presume the Marquis de Rochambeau can as well afford to present these papers to the Government as he can to keep them; they would be worth just as much in the one case as they would in the other.

It appears to me, after these gentlemen have been invited hither as the guests of the nation, and entertained at the nation's expense, that it smells a little of the pawnbroker's shop, a little of dealers in second-hand clothing, to place the most distinguished of these guests in the attitude of asking the nation to make him a benefaction of $20,000.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope my friend does not understand that to be the case.

Mr. INGALLS. The friends of the Marquis de Rochambeau are placing him in a very unfavorable attitude, which I believe he will be unwilling to occupy.

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish simply to state that he brings these papers here at the request of the Committee on the Library.

Mr. INGALLS. The Committee on the Library have not been authorized by the Senate or by Congress to ask the Marquis de Rochambeau to submit papers here for purchase by Congress.

Mr. ANTHONY. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. INGALLS. Certainly.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Committee on the Library has been instructed to inquire into the expediency of purchasing them.

Mr. INGALLS. Very true.

Mr. ANTHONY. And as a method of finding out whether it was proper to purchase them or not the committee asked the Marquis de Rochambeau to submit them to inspection.

Mr. HOAR. And before he was our guest. It was an independent transaction.

Mr. INGALLS. That does not change the statement I have made that the Committee on the Library had not been instructed either by the Senate or by Congress to have these papers brought here for the purpose of committing Congress to their purchase at the sum of $20,000. There has been a great deal too much of a sort of flatulent sentimentality about old swords and old papers for the last few years, indeed so long as I have been in the Senate. I believe that the sum of $10,000 has been fixed upon as the price of a sword and $20,000 for a collection of old papers. Now, I have no doubt that there may be value about this collection; I am aware that collections of private papers are the fountains of history; but if these gentlemen desire that Congress shall purchase these papers their proper plan would be to deposit them with the Secretary of State who should call the attention of Congress to their value and make suggestions about them.

I repeat, sir, with all due respect, that the declarations made here have placed the French guests in an attitude before the nation that I am unwilling to believe they desire to occupy. I hope that this matter may be further considered before a resolution is adopted committing the Senate to the purchase of these papers from the Marquis de Rochambeau upon the assumption that it is a charity bestowed upon him because he is too poor to present them, as he would otherwise be glad to do, to the American people.

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President, as the Senator from Kansas has seen fit to indulge in strictures on the conduct of the Library Committee in connection with these papers, I have a word to say.

Mr. INGALLS. Nothing was further from my intention.

Mr. VOORHEES. This matter was referred to the Committee on the Library with instructions to inquire into the expediency and propriety of purchasing these papers. With that care and circumspection which becomes a committee of this body we determined not to proceed in the matter until we could see and inspect them. For that purpose a request was made that the papers be transmitted here.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. VOORHRES. Yes.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Were these papers brought to this country at the request of any official of this Government?

Mr. VOORHEES. I will answer the question how they came. I repeat that under the authority of a resolution of the Senate instructing us to inquire into the expediency and propriety of purchasing these papers, as one of the steps in the discharge of that duty imposed upon us and in the exercise of what we deemed a sound discretion we determined not to purchase them until we saw them, and therefore requested them to be transmitted here.

Now, to the Senator from Kansas I will say that they came here without any expense to us. It so happened that the ancestor of the present Marquis de Rochambeau was in this country one hundred years ago and we invited his descendant to come to the recent centennial celebration at Yorktown, and in coming he put into his trunk these papers in response to the request of the Senate committee; and thus they are here in no spirit of pawnbroking or selling of old clothes. I think there is nobody on this floor who has placed that distinguished member of a distinguished family of France in a false attitude except the Senator from Kansas, for, to repeat myself, I say they came here in response to a request made by a committee charged with a duty in regard to purchasing them. They desired them here, and they came in a very natural and simple manner, in the custody of their owner who had been invited to this country, and he is ready to take them away when he leaves the city, which I do not want him to do. For that reason I concurred with the chairman of the committee, the Senator from Ohio, in indicating on the part of the Senate a desire to him to leave them here with a view to negotiating for them hereafter.

There is no indelicacy on the part of the Marquis de Rochambeau in this matter at all. There is no impropriety on the part of the committee. I agree with the Senator from Kansas to this extent, that there is a certain implied obligation on our part to purchase these papers if we pass this resolution, and I am glad that it will be so for I want to purchase them.

Now, a word in regard to what inspection they have had. As a matter of course we know that every Senator cannot individually examine every subject upon which we pass. It would be quite impossible for every Senator to inspect these papers. The Senator from Rhode Island, the senior member of this body, [Mr. ANTHONY,] is more familiar with these papers, perhaps, than any member of the Senate, and I take what he says in regard to their value as true. I have talked within the last few days with the Assistant Secretary of State who has gone over the papers, thoroughly inspected them, and he informs me that their value is even greater than I had supposed. I give credence to human testimony. I take the word of honorable men. I believe what they tell me and believing that I feel that this is a proper step to take. The purchase of the papers hereafter will be a subject for consideration with a certain sense of implied obligation.

In regard to the value of old papers and old swords people may differ. I think the accomplished Senator from Kansas is quite as much indebted for his brilliance of rhetoric and his wide range of historic knowledge to the possession of old papers as anybody else on this floor, and I think a moment's reflection will make him desire to withdraw his strictures upon the value of old papers. As to old swords, that is another subject. Doubtless the Senator in his debates here would prefer to use a fresh blade, but still there is a value attached to old swords. However, we are not discussing that subject. As to old papers of historic value, they cannot be put away with a sneer or a jibe. They are of great and incalculable value, and I hope the resolution as modified on the suggestion of the Senator from Vermont may be passed, and we will take care of this subject hereafter.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, I am sure the Senator from Indiana will believe me when I say that in the observations I made nothing was further from my purpose than to cast any imputation on the Library Committee. I stated that no instructions had been given by the Senate to the Library Committee to bring these papers here which should commit the Senate to their purchase. Neither have I said anything that could be construed as in derogation of the value of these papers. I said that personal archives were the fountain-head of history, and that for all the information I had these papers might possess exceptional and extraordinary value. But without information, without knowing what portion of these papers has already been printed and what are original, without information about the character of the archives we are called upon to purchase, I submit that, in view of the declaration of the Senator from Indiana himself if we pass this resolution the Senate is committed to a proposition to purchase these papers for the sum of $20,000, we have not advice sufficient to authorize us to take that course.

Mr. VOORHEES. The Senator has stated my position a little broader than I stated it myself. I say there is in a certain sense an implied obligation to purchase these papers, but not at any fixed price. As a matter of course their value would be determined on a full inspection. I have no doubt, however, I say frankly, that they are worth that sum of money and I expect more.

Mr. INGALLS. After these papers have survived the vicissitudes of one hundred years, there is no probability that they will be specially damaged or injured by remaining in their present custody until December; and inasmuch as if we pass this resolution we commit ourselves to the proposition irrevocably to purchase them at the price fixed by the Marquis de Rochambeau, I submit to the Senator from Indiana whether we ought not to have more information.

Now, Mr. President, without expressing any opinion whatever about their value, without casting any imputation upon them, having faith that they are worth a large sum of money, I move, to test the sense of the Senate, that this resolution be committed to the Committee on the Library so that they may advise the Senate more fully and definitely as to the proposition to which they desire to commit us.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is to recommit. The resolution is a report from the Library Committee.

Mr. INGALLS. The rules, if the Chair will pardon me for referring to that subject, recognize only a motion to commit. The motion to recommit is not recognized by Rule 43.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, the Committee on the Library has given to the Senate all the information that we can possibly communicate to the Senate unless we bring the books and papers here in the presence of the Senate. We have examined them and many other persons besides members of the committee have examined them—officers of the Department of State, the Librarian of Congress, whose judgment is worth more than that of all the Senators combined in regard to their value. We have the schedule itself, furnished to us four years ago, which has been carefully compared with the papers now exhibited. Unless the Senator from Kansas desires the Committee on the Library to send a carriage and bring these books and papers here into our presence and present them to him, we can furnish no further evidence than we have done.

Mr. VOORHEES. Allow me to ask the Senator from Ohio whether he has not himself personally examined these papers?

Mr. SHERMAN. I have examined them; but I consider my opinion as much less valuable than the opinion of the Librarian or the Secretary of State; and every person who has seen these papers is convinced of their great historical importance. The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY] went with me; we examined them together. We saw the original documents, saw papers in the handwriting of Washington. There are fourteen hundred of them, many of them quite large volumes, letter-books, copy-books, original letters; they would fill a large trunk. The Senator from Indiana made only one mistake, and that is he said the Marquis put them in the trunk. They were put in a very large trunk and brought here carefully and in very good condition.

I trust the Senate will do what is right in this matter. No Senator need feel bound to pay $20,000 unless he thinks they are worth that when the subject is more fully presented. I hope, therefore, we shall have a vote.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, I desire, lest the observations I made might have seemed to imply that I desired in any way whatever to reflect upon the conduct of the Marquis de Rochambeau or the French guests, to say that nothing was further from my intention. I have no doubt that these papers were brought here at the request of those whom the Marquis de Rochambeau believed to have had the authority to invite him to do so. I merely intended to say that the action of the Senate in passing this resolution for the reasons that had been advanced by the Senator from Vermont and others would place the Marquis and his friends in an attitude that I did not believe they themselves desired to occupy.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, there are some things that, if done at all, ought to be done gracefully. Now I think there is not a Senator here who will look over one-quarter part of this catalogue that will not give his judgment that the papers are of great value. My own inspection of them has been very brief, but at the same time I see that they are from General Washington, from Lafayette, and from various parties, and only a very small number have ever yet been in print.

Now, for one, I expect to be committed to pay $20,000 for these papers if we pass this resolution; and I am very glad to be committed to that project. I think that they are cheap, and it would be the part of higgling, a picayune kind of economy, for us to pretend that these papers ought to be further examined after having been examined by the Secretary of State, by the Librarian, and by more than one member of the Committee on the Library, who have given their judgment unanimously, so far as I know, that these papers ought to be purchased. We do not, of course, commit the House of Representatives, but we do commit so many of the Senate as vote for this resolution. I hope it will be unanimously adopted on the part of the Senate.

Mr. MAXEY. Mr. President, the Count de Rochambeau undoubtedly was in a situation commanding a corps six thousand strong in 1780–1781 during the Revolutionary War to give the American people a volume of information of immense value in respect to the closing years of the Revolution. The papers of that distinguished officer properly kept would pour a flood of light on that period of our Revolutionary War. I am one of those who believe that the epoch of the Revolution should be kept in reverence by the American people, and I believe that the youth of our country should be taught to revere the men who took part in that great Revolutionary War, which established, and I hope forever, the independence of this people. With me the question of a few dollars in the purchase of papers which may throw a great flood of light on that wonderful period not only in the history of this country, but the world's history of man's successful struggle for freedom, self-government, and independence, will be of infinitely more worth than the money contemplated for the purchase of these papers. I want these papers placed in the possession of the Committee on the Library, whose intelligence and culture we all admit, and if they inform the Senate that these papers are valuable to a thorough understanding of American history, unquestionably they ought to be purchased at a fair and reasonable price. The American people will gladly sustain Congress in such contribution to American history.

Mr. BUTLER. Let the resolution be reported, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read again for the information of the Senate.

The Acting Secretary read the resolution as modified.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. President, while I have no hesitation in committing myself, so far as the declaration of my present opinion is concerned, to the purchase of these papers at $20,000, I do not conceive that this resolution commits the Senate; and we cannot, of course, commit the other House. The papers are here at the request of a committee charged with inquiring into the expediency of purchasing them, and after that committee has examined them and reported upon them we are not committed to the purchase, nor then unless we vote for it.

Mr. BUTLER. May I inquire further whether the resolution comes from the Committee on the Library?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It does. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. INGALLS,] to commit this resolution to the Committee on the Library.

The motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the adoption of the resolution as amended.

The resolution was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGE.

A message, in writing, was received from the President of the United States by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries.

TREASURY CONTINGENT EXPENSES.

Mr. GARLAND. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. SHERMAN. Before that is done I propose to submit a resolution which may lie over until morning if it is desired.

Mr. GARLAND. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. SHERMAN submitted the following resolution; which was read:

Resolved, That the Finance Committee of the Senate be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to investigate the accounts for the expenditure of the several appropriations for contingent expenses of the Treasury Department since July 1, 1871, including the methods of making such disbursements, the character and disposition of the purchases made, and the employment of labor paid from such appropriations, and to report on the subject at as early a day as practicable, and whether any further legislation is necessary to secure the proper disbursement of such appropriations; and that the committee have leave to send for persons and papers.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will lie over under the rules.

Mr. VOORHEES. Before the Senator from Arkansas proposes his motion I should be glad to call up the resolution I offered yesterday on the subject of the pay of the employés of the Senate.

Mr. MORRILL. Was any objection made to the resolution offered by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN?]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It goes over. He offered it, but did not ask for its present consideration.

Mr. MORRILL. I did not hear any one object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No objection was made.

Mr. MORRILL. The Senator asked for present action, did he not?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio, the Chair understands, asks for the present consideration of the resolution introduced by him.

Mr. HARRIS. Let it be reported again.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I think the Senator from Ohio had better allow it to be printed. There may be a slight amendment necessary. I am in favor of the resolution if he desires it passed. Let it go over and be printed.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be printed and laid over.

PAYMENT OF SALARIES.

The Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. VOORHEES:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay the salaries of the officers and employés of the Senate for the current month upon the adjournment of this special session of the Senate.

Mr. VOORHEES. A single word, Mr. President, in explanation. The sole object of the resolution is to enable the Secretary to pay the employés of the Senate when we adjourn to-day or to-morrow, rather than require them to wait till the end of the month. Some of them want to go home. It is simply to anticipate the amount that will be due them at the close of the month.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let the resolution be read again.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be again read.

The Acting Secretary read the resolution.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Does that mean this calendar month of October?

Mr. VOORHEES. Yes, sir.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then I suggest to add, to save all possible questions, "ending 31st instant" so that there shall not be any question about the running month.

Mr. VOORHEES. I accept that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be so modified.

The resolution, as modified, was agreed to

LADIES' RETIRING-ROOM.

Mr. MORRILL, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred a resolution submitted by Mr. HARRIS on the 21st instant, reported it with an amendment to strike out "now" and insert "formerly" before the word "occupied."

The resolution, as amended by the committee, was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Architect of the Capitol be, and hereby is, instructed to cause the room at the north gallery of the Senate Chamber, now used as the ladies' retiring-room, to be converted into two rooms for the use of committees; and that the room on the basement floor of the Senate wing, formerly occupied by the Committee on Civil Service, be fitted up for and to be used hereafter as the ladies' retiring-room.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. GARLAND. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After two hours and four minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at two o'clock and fifty minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, October 26, 1881.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

A message, in writing, was received from the President of the United States by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries.

POTOMAC RIVER FRONT.

Mr. RANSOM submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the power and authority vested in the Committee on Commerce by the resolution adopted May 9, 1881, with reference to an inquiry into the condition of the Potomac River front of the city of Washington, be continued during the ensuing recess of the Senate; and that the report of the committee be made in December next.

AGRICULTURAL REPORT FOR 1880.

Mr. BUTLER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent:

Resolved, That the Committee on Printing be, and is hereby, instructed to inquire and report why the reports from the Commissioner of Agriculture for the year 1880 have not been delivered to Congress for distribution.

Mr. BECK. I desire to vote for the adoption of the resolution, but I hope the committee will further inquire why it is that there are over 40,000 copies of the Agricultural Report for the year 1879 which have not yet been delivered to the Senate, and why it is that reports of every sort go to all the Executive Departments before they come here. I am told the Paris Exposition Report was delivered to the State Department a good while ago, although we cannot get any copies.

Mr. BUTLER. I will state in this connection that I am informed the reports for 1880 have not been printed; they are nearly two years behind; and it seems to me if those reports will do any good at all Congress ought to have them at once. Hence I have introduced a resolution of inquiry.

The resolution was agreed to.

DEPARTMENTAL EXPENSES.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution I offered yesterday.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. SHERMAN:

Resolved, That the Finance Committee of the Senate be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to investigate the accounts for the expenditure of the several appropriations for contingent expenses of the Treasury Department since July 1, 1871, including the methods of making such disbursements, the character and disposition of the purchases made, and the employment of labor paid from such appropriations, and to report on the subject at as early a day as practicable, and whether any further legislation is necessary to secure the proper disbursement of such appropriations; and that the committee have leave to send for persons and papers.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to modify the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The modifications submitted by the Senator from Ohio will be reported.

The ACTING SECRETARY. Strike out in line 1 the word "Finance" and insert after the word "Committee" the words "on Appropriations;" and in the fourth line strike out the words "Treasury Department" and insert "several Executive Departments;" so as to read:

Resolved, That the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to investigate the accounts for the expenditure of the several appropriations for contingent expenses of the several Executive Departments since July 1, 1871, including the methods of making such disbursements, the character and disposition of the purchases made, and the employment of labor paid from such appropriations, and to report on the subject at as early a day as practicable, and whether any further legislation is necessary to secure the proper disbursement of such appropriations; and that the committee have leave to send for persons and papers.

Mr. SHERMAN. I suggest also that the words "since July 1, 1871," be stricken out, so that the investigation may be unlimited.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The mover can modify his resolution in that regard. The words "since July 1, 1871," are stricken out.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I should be glad to have the attention of the Senator from Ohio for a moment. I am aware that the mover of a resolution of this character should be largely consulted and therefore I have no wish to offer an amendment not agreeable to the Senator from Ohio, but I know he would not object to anything which he believed proper to carry out the intention of the resolution. I was about to ask the Senator from Ohio, before he submitted the modification to change the investigation from the Committee on Finance to the Committee on Appropriations, to refer the matter to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment, but if he prefers the Committee on Appropriations I have no objection at all.

Mr. SHERMAN. It seems to me it should go to the Committee on Appropriations, that being the only committee which has the ordinary charge of such appropriations.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I think probably the Senator is right.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to say that I made the modification because I am a member of the Finance Committee and do not wish the investigation referred to that committee.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. For the same reason, I, being a member of the Committee on Appropriations, prefer that it should be sent to some other committee. But I suggest to the Senator, would it not be better to include other appropriations as well as those which are contingent? For instance, the committee might run against some particular payment and not be able to go outside of the contingent fund to investigate it. I suggest to the Senator whether it would not be well to say "contingent or other appropriations."

Mr. SHERMAN. I supposed that the investigation ought to be confined to the subject-matter, but I have no objection to its being extended to any other appropriation.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Then if the Senator has no objection let that modification be also made.

Mr. MORRILL. I hope that the Senator from West Virginia will not include so much that no result will follow from the examination. My impression is that all the contingent funds of the several Executive Departments need to be thoroughly examined, and if the committee shall find time to go through with all the different Executive Departments upon that subject they will perform a valuable service. I hope they will not be embarrassed by so much work that nothing will result from it.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I agree with both the Senators, but as I have supposed the case, the first thing that may present itself while the committee is examining as to certain appropriations or as to certain methods of paying money is that the payment did not come out of the contingent fund but out of some other fund. I do not think it would give any additional work at all, and I believe that other appropriations had as well be included.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to that.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I offer such an amendment, by the consent of the Senator from Ohio.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will reduce his amendment to writing so that the Senator from Ohio may accept it.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is simply to insert the words "or other" at the proper place; that is all.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That modification will be made.

Mr. EDMUNDS and Mr. BECK addressed the Chair.

Mr. BECK. I wish to suggest——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont caught the eye of the Chair first.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to amend the resolution by adding "and have leave to sit during the recess of the Senate."

Mr. BECK. That is precisely the motion I rose to make.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The object the Senator from Ohio has chiefly in view is to have reflections upon his conduct as Secretary of the Treasury and upon officers there investigated at the earliest possible moment. Although the resolution now is so broad as to cover all other contingent expenses everywhere, which is very proper of course, the committee would desire, as the Senator from Ohio would desire, that their attention should be directed to this matter which led to the introduction of the resolution. In order to accomplish that speedily, I think they ought to have authority to sit during the recess of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont moves to amend the resolution by adding that the committee have authority to sit during the recess of the Senate. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on agreeing to the resolution as amended.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask that the resolution may be reported now as amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

The Acting Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to investigate the accounts for the expenditure of the several appropriations for contingent or other expenses of the several Executive Departments, including the methods of making such disbursements, the character and disposition of the purchases made, and the employment of labor paid from such appropriations, and to report on the subject at as early a day as practicable, and whether any further legislation is necessary to secure the proper disbursement of such appropriations; and that the committee have leave to send for persons and papers, and have leave to sit during the recess of the Senate.

The resolution, as amended, was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I now move that the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, with the accompanying papers, sent to us the other day, be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I suggest that the resolution be printed as amended, so that the committee may have it before them.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It will be printed, as a matter of course.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution, as agreed to, will be printed for the use of the committee.

OFFICIAL REGISTER.

Mr. ANTHONY, from the Committee on Printing, to which was referred a resolution to print 500 copies of the first volume of the Official Register, reported it without amendment, and it was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That 500 additional copies of the first volume of the Official Register, now in press, be printed and bound in cloth, for the use of the Senate.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After forty-nine minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at one o'clock and nine minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

THURSDAY, October 27, 1881.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PAYMENT OF EMPLOYÉS.

Mr. BECK submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be directed to pay to the pages and the employés of the Senate who do not receive an annual salary full pay for the month of October, 1881, the same to be paid out of the miscellaneous items of the contingent fund of the Senate.

DEPARTMENTAL EXPENSES INVESTIGATION.

Mr. ALLISON submitted the following resolution; which was read:

Resolved, That the Committee on Appropriations may conduct the investigation ordered by the resolution of the 26th instant by a sub-committee of its members, if it so orders, and that each member of such sub-committee shall have power to administer oaths. Said committee shall have power to employ a stenographer during said investigation; and the expenses of conducting the same shall be paid out of the appropriations for select and special committees.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think that had better lie over to be examined, for I do not quite see (and I believe we have so thought before) how the Senate can authorize a sub-committee of a committee to administer oaths, inasmuch as the statute has attempted to regulate that, stating that the chairmen of committees, and so on, may do it. Therefore I think the resolution had better be looked into a little before it is acted upon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will lie over.

COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY.

Mr. INGALLS submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the authority vested in the Committee on the Judiciary by the resolution adopted April 26, 1881, be continued during the ensuing recess of the Senate, with power to report in December next.

REMOVAL OF RAILROAD DEPOTS.

Mr. MORRILL submitted the following resolution; which was read:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds be instructed to inquire into the expediency and propriety of some measures for the immediate removal of the railroad depot and tracks on Sixth street of the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad, and also for the removal of the depot of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad.

Mr. MORRILL. Let the resolution be referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Why not have it adopted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, there being no objection.

Mr. MORRILL. I will ask that it be adopted.

Mr. INGALLS. Let it lie over until to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont has asked that the resolution be referred, the Chair understands.

Mr. INGALLS. I understood the Senator to ask that the resolution be adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No, referred.

Mr. INGALLS. Then I misunderstood the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. MORRILL. I merely ask to have the committee authorized to make this inquiry.

Mr. COCKRELL. That requires the adoption of the resolution; and I object to it if that is the case.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution lies over until to-morrow.

GENERAL LAND OFFICE.

Mr. MORGAN. I offer the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the powers and authority conferred on the Committee on Public Lands by the resolution of the Senate adopted May 19, 1881, be continued, with leave to said committee to sit during the recess of the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What are those powers?

Mr. MORGAN. I will send the Senator a copy of the original resolution.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator can state in a moment what they are.

Mr. MORGAN. I have sent the resolution to the Senator's desk.

Mr. EDMUNDS. All right. I have no objection to the resolution, Mr. President.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask for the present consideration of the resolution.

Mr. CONGER. I should like to have the original resolution referred to read.

Mr. MORGAN. I send a copy of the original resolution to the Clerk's desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The original resolution will be read.

The Acting Secretary read the following resolution adopted on the 19th of May, 1881:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands is instructed to take into consideration the condition of the General Land Office with respect to the classification of the officers and employés thereof, the convenient arrangement and security of the files and records of said office, and the provision of additional room for the transaction of the business thereof.

2. That said committee have leave to sit during the recess of the Senate, to employ a stenographer, and to send for persons and papers.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

INTERNATIONAL COTTON EXPOSITION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a telegraphic message received from the governor of Georgia; which will be read.

The Acting Secretary read as follows:

ATLANTA, GEORGIA, October 26, 1881.

Hon. DAVID DAVIS,
President pro tempore United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

The officers and executive committee of the International Cotton Exposition tender to you a most cordial invitation to visit the exposition at your earliest convenience; also, through you, extend this invitation to all members of the Senate. If you will advise when you can leave Washington, we will see that special accommodations are arranged for your journey.

ALFRED H. COLQUITT,
Governor and President of the Exposition.
H. I. KIMBALL,
Director-General.

Mr. HARRIS. Let the communication lie upon the table.

Mr. ANTHONY. And be printed.

Mr. HARRIS. Yes, printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

A message, in writing, was received from the President of the United States by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries.

Mr. HARRIS. If there be no further business in open session, I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five hours and thirty-two minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at five o'clock and fifty-seven minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

FRIDAY, October 28, 1881.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PETITIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented the petition of the Pecan Valley Bank, of Brownwood, Texas, and the petition of the Taylor County Bank, of Abilene, Texas, in favor of the repeal of the taxes now levied by the General Government upon the business of bankers, banks, and banking institutions, and recommending that the petty annoyance to which the public are subjected by the two-cent stamp upon bank-checks be also removed; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

REMOVAL OF RAILROAD DEPOTS.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, I observe that the resolution introduced by me yesterday was not referred. I understand from a member of the Committee on the District of Columbia that the matter has heretofore been referred to that committee for consideration and that they have made examination and received several reports from different branches of the Government, and perhaps from the railroad companies. I merely desire to call the attention of the Senate to the obstinate procrastination on the part of the Baltimore and Potomac Company against doing anything in relation to the removal of the depot here.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will allow the resolution to be read.

Mr. MORRILL. Certainly. I ask to have the resolution read.

The Acting Secretary read the following resolution, submitted yesterday by Mr. MORRILL:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds be instructed to inquire into the expediency and propriety of some measures for the immediate removal of the railroad depot and tracks on Sixth street of the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad, and also for the removal of the depot of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution went over yesterday on an objection, and it is now before the Senate for consideration.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to say that the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad Company have violated all the privileges which were given to them originally; that is to say, they have built a track upon Sixth street where they constantly leave freight cars and other cars, wholly obstructing that street and making it impossible on account of the number of trains which are passing and repassing to make any use of the public Mall as it was originally designed to be. Then, again, they were to have built an elevated bridge across the track that was to cost $75,000 to enable those who visit the park to get across the track without danger. That they have not done.

Heretofore some of the agents and representatives of the company thought Congress would be willing to do all that they ought to require; that is to say, to give them an equal amount of land in the open squares south of the Capitol, being as much land as they now occupy, and that the Government, perhaps, would be willing to buy the building at whatever it might be worth for the uses of the District or for some other purpose; and yet they are going on at the present time erecting an iron shed there 300 feet long and 40 feet wide, as I understand, showing their determination to remain there in spite of the opinions of Congress and in spite of anything that can be done on the part of the District.

I wish to call the attention of the District Committee to this matter. I have no desire that it should be in the hands of more than one committee, but I think it is a matter that requires early and serious attention.

As I understand, the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company are quite willing to remove their depot if any mutual arrangement can be had with the other company; and if not, it has been proposed heretofore (and I suppose it will be again) that that depot shall be removed north of Massachusetts avenue; but at all events both of these depots are nuisances of large magnitude, standing where they now do, and I trust that the Committee on the District of Columbia will give their early attention to the subject.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, the resolution offered by the Senator from Vermont yesterday proposed to instruct the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds to inquire into the expediency and propriety of the removal of the Baltimore and Ohio and the Baltimore and Potomac depots. I objected primarily to the consideration of the resolution at that time, because the Committee on the District of Columbia have always had jurisdiction of that subject, and the matter has been before them for the past year. They have taken a large amount of evidence, have received suggestions from surveyors and engineers, and have been considering the advisability of providing for a union depot which both companies may use, under the supervision of Congress. It was on that account that I objected to the further instruction to another committee to consider a subject that had already been deliberately considered by the Committee on the District of Columbia. There can be no question——

Mr. HARRIS. If the Senator from Kansas will allow me to suggest a fact that he seems not to have remembered, I will say that, in addition to the facts which the Senator has stated, the commissioners of the District of Columbia are now under instruction to thoroughly investigate and to report to us at the next session of Congress in December the best location for a union depot, to which both of these depots can be transferred; and they are prosecuting that investigation to-day.

Mr. INGALLS. That is true.

Mr. MORRILL. And yet, Mr. President, some District authority has given the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad Company the right to erect an iron shed of the vast dimensions I have stated.

Mr. INGALLS. As I understand the matter, that is a temporary arrangement, the sheds having been brought down here from Philadelphia to be used while other arrangements were being made, the present accommodations for the traveling public being obviously unsatisfactory and insufficient. But I beg to assure the Senator from Vermont that no person with whom I am acquainted has any doubt about the advisability and propriety of removing both of these railroad depots, nor is there any question that there ought to be a union depot which both these companies may use under regulations provided by Congress.

I agree with the Senator in thinking that the original permission given to the Baltimore and Potomac Company to lay their track through the Mall or public reservation was a great mistake. It never ought to have been tolerated; it would not have been tolerated under any other circumstances than those which prevailed when the permission was given; and its continued use up to this time has been an annoyance, an inconvenience, and to a certain extent a disgrace to this city.

I hope that we shall be able at the next session of Congress to report some measures by which both these depots and the tracks of both corporations may be removed from their present unsightly and inconvenient location to some point where they will afford union depot facilities to the people of this District and the traveling public.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. MORRILL. After the explanation made by the Senator from Kansas, I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. HARRIS. I suggest to the Senator from Vermont that he modify his resolution.

Mr. MORRILL. I will modify the resolution so as to refer the inquiry to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It ought to be an instruction to the Committee on the District of Columbia, I think. Strike out "Public Buildings and Grounds" and insert "the District of Columbia;" so that the District Committee may be instructed to take this matter into consideration.

Mr. INGALLS. They have already been instructed to do so.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution is a resolution of instruction.

Mr. INGALLS. With the modification proposed there is no objection to it.

Mr. CONGER. Let the resolution be read as modified.

The Acting Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the District of Columbia be instructed to inquire into the expediency and propriety of some measures for the immediate removal of the railroad depot and track on Sixth street of the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad, and also for the removal of the depot of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as modified.

The resolution, as modified, was agreed to.

DEPARTMENTAL EXPENSES INVESTIGATION.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to call up a resolution that I offered yesterday, and I propose a modification of it. I ask the Secretary to read the resolution as modified.

The Acting Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Appropriations may conduct the investigation ordered by the resolution of the 26th instant by a sub-committee of its members, if it so orders. Said committee shall have power to employ a stenographer during said investigation; and the expenses of conducting the same shall be paid out of the appropriations for select and special committees.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa calls for action on the resolution, the Chair understands.

Mr. ALLISON. Yes; I ask that it be adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as modified.

The resolution, as modified, was agreed to.

AGRICULTURAL REPORT FOR 1880.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Committee on Printing, instructed to inquire into the cause of delay in the publication of the Agricultural Reports for 1879 and 1880, have directed me to make a verbal report.

The number of copies deficient of the report of 1879 is only 3,890 odd, and these are kept back while waiting for the reprint of a portion of the illustrations which were spoiled in packing.

The delay in printing the Report of the Commissioner of Agriculture for 1880 is owing to the fact that the copy has not yet all been received. I will state that this is not the fault of the present Commissioner of Agriculture, who desires that the reports shall be made quarterly, so that they may be fresher. I think that the suggestion is worthy of consideration. It has been the custom for the Commissioner of Agriculture to keep back the copy of his report until a very late period. That has been the custom for a number of years.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Do I understand from the Senator that the report of the Commissioner is not yet furnished to the Public Printer?

Mr. ANTHONY. It is not yet all furnished to the Public Printer.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. It is not?

Mr. ANTHONY. Not the report for 1880.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Not yet furnished?

Mr. ANTHONY. Not yet furnished to the Public Printer.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Then I think the Commissioner of Agriculture ought to be stirred up a little, and I hope he will be. I want the report printed and sent here as soon as possible.

Mr. ANTHONY. The report was made by the ex-Commissioner of Agriculture, not by the present Commissioner.

Although not instructed to investigate the matter, the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] hoped the committee would also inquire into the cause of the delay in supplying to Senators the report of the Paris exposition, copies of which had been sent to the State Department, but not distributed to members of Congress. The commissioner to the exposition, Governor McCormick, was desirous of resigning, and before resigning wished to distribute the number of copies assigned to the State Department so far as he had control over them. Therefore the Public Printer, not anticipating this special session of the Senate, first supplied the copies to which the State Department was entitled. The report will be supplied very soon to Senators.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Upon the subject of the Report of the Commissioner of Agriculture, I think the country suffers greatly by the delay in furnishing the copy to the Public Printer and also by the Public Printer delaying it so long. For instance, the year 1881 is nearly closed and the report for 1880 is not yet furnished, so that whatever information there is in the report of use to the farmer will be stale by the time he gets his copy, and probably of no service to him. Generally it is perhaps eighteen months or two years from the time the fiscal year commences before the report for the previous year can be distributed to the country. I hope this discussion may call the attention of both the Public Printer and the Commissioner of Agriculture to the late period at which the Agricultural Report is given to the country. I think it is delayed much longer than is necessary.

Mr. ANTHONY. There is no need of calling the attention of the Public Printer to the delay in not printing a document the copy of which has not been furnished to him. As soon as the copy is furnished to him, it will doubtless be printed.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. My impression is that this subject was before the Senate last year and that both the Public Printer and the Commissioner of Agriculture were questioned as to the cause of the delay; that they differed, one saying that the copy had been furnished in time and the other thinking it had not; and that finally, upon inquiry, the delay was found to be the fault perhaps of both, some plates or something of the kind having been delayed, but the whole of the matter to be printed being in the hands of the Public Printer, as I was told.

Mr. ANTHONY. The chief clerk of the Public Printer writes me: "As to the report for 1880, I would say that all the copy has not yet been sent to this office by the Agricultural Department." Of course, there is no need to inquire into the reason why the Printer delays printing a document when he has not received the copy.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I hope, at any rate, let the fault be where it will, it will not be repeated, as has been the case for several years.

COMMITTEE ON PRINTING.

Mr. ANTHONY. While I am on the floor, I move that the Committee on Printing have leave to sit during the recess of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved by the Senator from Rhode Island that the Committee on Printing have leave to sit during the recess of the Senate. The question is on agreeing to the motion.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After fourteen hours and twenty-five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at two o'clock and fifty-three minutes a. m., Saturday) the Senate adjourned.

SATURDAY, October 29, 1881.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

APPOINTMENTS TO OFFICE.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia, submitted the following resolution; which was read:

Resolved, That appointments to offices under the Federal Government ought not to be made to control or influence elections in the several States; and appointments made with such intent are unwise, unpatriotic, and contrary to the spirit of our political institutions, and if continued without rebuke by the people will become dangerous to the perpetuity of our institutions.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I ask for the present consideration of the resolution.

Mr. McMILLAN. I object to the consideration of the resolution at the present time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the resolution goes over under the rule.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I ask that it be printed.

Mr. ALLISON. Of course.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be printed and lie over.

PAYMENT OF EMPLOYÉS.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, within two days past, I think it was, a resolution was adopted which was offered by the Senator from Kentucky who is not now in his seat, [Mr. BECK,] providing for the pay of employés of the Senate. It seems that there is some difficulty which the Comptroller of the Treasury has discovered in the form of the resolution, and under it he does not feel authorized to pay, because the date of payment prescribed in that resolution commences before the session of the Senate. It was intended to give a month's pay to the employés, and by some unfortunate wording of the resolution I understand the Comptroller of the Treasury does not feel authorized to pass accounts under it.

I therefore move that the vote adopting that resolution be reconsidered with a view of offering a substitute.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there any objection to the reconsideration of the resolution asked for by the Senator from Alabama? The Chair hears no objection, and the vote is reconsidered.

Mr. MORGAN. I will allow the matter to remain now until the Senator from Kentucky comes into the Chamber.

DISTRIBUTION OF PUBLIC DOCUMENTS.

Mr. HOAR. I offer a resolution to which I believe there will be no objection, and I ask for its present consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Printing be directed to consider what improvements may be made in the existing system of distributing public documents, and providing for a more prompt and perfect supply of the same to public libraries, and that said committee have power to report at the next session of the Senate.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I desire to be permitted to say one word about the resolution. The public documents, especially the scientific documents, published by this Government, are of increasing value year by year, and are very eagerly sought for by scientific men and others, and by the custodians of public libraries in order to enable them to supply the demand from such persons. The system which now prevails is imperfect and awkward; it involves great delay in furnishing the public documents whose value depends on their being promptly accessible. For instance, to take one illustration, I am informed as to the Nautical Almanac that the computations are made up and the document printed three years in advance; that is, the Nautical Almanac for 1884 is to come out about this time, and those almanacs are to be sent to Senators and Representatives for distribution.

Mr. COCKRELL. They never have been sent in advance heretofore?

Mr. HOAR. They never have been sent heretofore in advance, but that is the arrangement for the future. Now, it is a burden which no Senator or Representative ought to be required to undertake, and which very few Senators and Representatives are competent to undertake, to determine among the various applicants for such a document as that where the copies shall be sent, and it puts Senators and Representatives in a very awkward position.

A great many persons, under the old practice, regarded it as a sort of compliment to receive a document occasionally from his Senator or Representative, especially if he was a personal or political friend, and the member of Congress who discontinues that practice gives offense to a great many men. Here is some very respectable person who has been in the habit of receiving from his Representative the public documents as they come out. He never reads them; they go on his shelf; but he regards their reception as a mark of respect and as adding to his dignity. A new Representative or Senator comes in who sends them elsewhere and the person feels that he is neglected; that the recognition of his importance and consequence which used to exist no longer exists. That is a very disagreeable thing for the member of Congress to have occur with respect to a constituent.

I had in my old district in Massachusetts, when I left the representation of that district, twenty-seven, I will not say all of them large, but growing, well-established public libraries, most of them now ample and valuable libraries for the supply of the scholarship of the neighborhood where they exist, all of them certain to become such libraries. With the exception of the Agricultural Report, the average number of documents which I used to get as a Representative was about fifteen, so that it was impossible for me to supply the wants of these various libraries in that district, without sending any documents to individuals whatever. The number that I now get is about forty, and I presume there are of such libraries in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, to say the least, two hundred and fifty or three hundred to whom the possession of the documents published by this Government would be extremely valuable. In the States which have lately been the scene of civil war and in the new States, I believe there is nothing which could be a more useful and ornamental institution than well-established public libraries. They grow. It is wonderful with what rapidity a small collection of books becomes a large collection; and it is wonderful how many young men in the neighborhood of such collections become scholars, investigators, fitted for public life, by having access to these collections. It seems to me it ought to be considered as improper for a man to use one of these public documents for the sake of gaining personal favor with a friend to the deprivation of a public library as if he used the public money for a purpose to subserve his individual ambition or his individual friendship.

I hope the accomplished chairman of the Committee on Printing, who is so fit to deal with a question of this character, will see that the education and scholarship of this country have a very deep interest in this matter. I have in my pocket at this moment a letter from the astronomer of Harvard University, the director of that amply endowed and famous school of astronomical science, saying that no provision is made by law by which that observatory can obtain either the Nautical Almanac or the volumes of astronomical calculations which have been recently published of which there are two or three of great value, and applying to me. I was entitled to but one of the publications, having the power to send out a single copy, but that had already been sent to the library of Harvard University.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President, as a member of the Committee on Printing I should like to make just a bare suggestion or two for the consideration of thoughful men. The resolution directs the Printing Committee to inquire what improvements in the system of distributing public documents can be devised and applied. Let me state a fact or two. We have already the largest public or private printing establishment in the world, and I think really perhaps the best. Notwithstanding all the cheap abuse that is from time to time lavished upon the Government Printing Office, it does admirable work and is the largest and best organized in the world. Now, if we are going to answer the demands suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts, we must enlarge that establishment, making it still larger. There is before us the necessity of more money and more work, or of a less ambitious scheme.

I have a very serious doubt as to the proper scope of our work in supplying all manner of instruction to the people in agriculture and general scientific attainments. We are sliding into the idea that the public libraries and the people of the country need not publish and buy for themselves a large class of valuable works.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOAR. The question I wish to put the Senator is, if he does not agree with me that so far as we do print these documents they ought to go into such directions as I have indicated rather than into the waste-basket?

Mr. HAWLEY. I suppose so; but I doubt, I say, whether it be the duty of the Federal Government to undertake to be a general publisher and instructor for the whole country. There is a very large range of valuable works which we publish now, and we undertake to give to the country all that it needs. We are not printing alone for our Government uses, but for general instruction. I venture to say there is not a single Senator here (unless possibly some one has noticed a discussion we had in the other House upon this matter) who knows how much we are doing. The Government Printing Office found itself about two years ago with a deficiency of something like half a million dollars, and great fault was found. We were directed in the House, a sub-committee of us, to inquire into the matter. With the help of the Public Printer and the Congressional Librarian, I made this estimate, a careful and correct one: In two sessions of Congress we had ordered printing enough to make ten times the Congressional Library. I made the comparison because people think that a vast library, and it is something visible. They see there those vast alcoves, the walls and alleys crowded with books. In two sessions we ordered books enough printed to make ten times that Library, and that did not include by any means the printing of ordinary circulars and blanks for the various Departments; it included practically only volumes and large unbound tracts. I say we are running into an enormous extravagance, and in my opinion attempting to cover a field that the Government ought not to try to cover.

I make the suggestion that we can very much extend the use and effect and application of a law we have now upon the books. We say now that if a man desires any of the books printed by the Government he may before they go to press order as many as he pleases, which he shall have at cost, with ten per cent. added; but there is practically very little done with that. The people do not know that a certain book is coming out; they know very little about it. They find one, they hear of one given out by their Member or Senator, and they write to him for a copy of it.

I am not one of those who are everlastingly thinking that the British Government does things better than we do; but in this particular they have taught their people much more than we have taught ours. Every British Government publication is put out at a very low price, and upon the title-page in large clear print is "One shilling sixpence," or "two shillings sixpence," or whatever is the price of that book, and they are easily to be got at government and other offices, so that no man has any excuse for besetting the public officers to give him those volumes. No library has an excuse, because very large books like our reports of the Agricultural Department and all that sort of thing can be obtained for twenty-five, thirty-five, or forty cents. Ours cost us really but about forty cents.

I say, then, we must either make up our mind to vastly enlarge what is the largest government or private printing office in the whole world or to withdraw somewhat our ambitious ideas about feeding and educating the entire people of the country in the vast range of scientific works.

Mr. PENDLETON. Mr. President, I am very glad that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] has introduced the pending resolution, for I think its scope and purpose will be to attain the end which the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] has so well said we ought to seek to attain. I agree with him, not as to the excellence of the printing establishment, because I know nothing about that, but that the amount of matter printed has passed all proper limits, and I think that has arisen from an improper mode of distributing the documents which are printed.

I think the Senator from Massachusetts has described a great evil that has grown up in this Government, by which members of Congress are expected to compliment their friends and constituents by sending a volume here and a volume there of costly books and not keeping them together so that they would form one set for the use of the community. I know it has happened to me constantly that applications are made for books the publication of which runs over three or four years, a volume or two being issued perhaps every year; and before the last volume is issued the persons who have received the first have passed out of mind or have died, and their books are scattered, or perhaps another member of the House of Representatives or of the Senate has the distribution of the books.

I believe if a system can be adopted such as that indicated in brief by the Senator from Massachusetts we shall attain the dissemination of public information such as that which is given by the Government, much more extensively among the people, and diminish at the same time largely the cost of printing.

I hope, therefore, that the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts will be adopted as a means of economy in our printing and to secure the wider distribution of public information.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. President, the Committee on Printing is not responsible for the enormous editions that have been printed of public documents. We have uniformly reported in favor of a reduction of the numbers that have been fixed by the other House, and we have been uniformly voted down by the Senate. I do not see the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. DAVIS] in his chair, but he has constantly antagonized the committee in its attempt to reduce the edition of the Agricultural Report; and he is the especial guardian of the Treasury.

Twice I have had the honor to introduce a bill here providing for the sale of public documents at cost, and it has passed the Senate but has not met the approbation of the other House. The present law, as the Senator from Connecticut says, allowing purchasers to apply in advance of the publication for documents and to have them at cost with the addition of 10 per cent., is of very little practical use, because, as he says, people do not know that a book is to be printed until it has been printed.

We have several times added to resolutions for printing documents for distribution a provision that a certain number shall be printed for sale, but it has always gone through the Senate by a very reluctant vote, and a very small number has been allowed, although the editions for sale of some of the books that have been printed under such a provision have been exhausted.

I agree fully with the remarks of the Senator from Massachusetts and the other Senators who have spoken upon this subject. It is not the fault of the Committee on Printing; it is not the fault of the Senate; and I suppose it is not proper to impute any fault to the other House. The other House has not seen fit to concur with us in the bills that we have passed for the purpose indicated.

Mr. RANSOM. Mr. President, I have listened with great attention to the thoughtful remarks made by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR,] the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. HAWLEY,] and my friend from Ohio, [Mr. PENDLETON.] If nothing had been said in reference to this resolution I should not have risen in regard to it. No doubt there can be and there should be a very great improvement in reference to the distribution of public documents; but I beg leave at the threshold of this discussion to enter, for one, my protest against any step or measure which looks to the diminution of the dissemination of public documents among the people of this country. At a time when all the means of information and knowledge are being multiplied and enlarged, when new light is going hourly to every home and every spot in this great Republic, I beg leave for one to say that I do not think this is the hour to curtail in any way the distribution of the information which is derived from public documents.

I shall have no objection whatever to seeing a provision made that all the public libraries may be furnished with these documents, and that a sufficient number of a valuable document shall be kept on hand to supply the needful wants of individuals and of public institutions; but right here I beg leave to make my protest against any step which looks to the diminution of the distribution of the public documents among the people of this country.

Without pandering to any public sentiment on that question, I must say that when I look abroad upon this great hemisphere and see, as every Senator here sees, what progress, what development, what grand results have emanated from the fact of each man in this great Republic pursuing his own happiness in his own way under the law, I for one am not willing to take any step which proposes to curtail that principle, even in the remotest degree.

Sir, I can conceive of no method by which so much good can be done to mankind generally and to individuals in particular as the general distribution of our great public documents in the way that they have been distributed for the last quarter of a century.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is the Senate ready for the question on agreeing to the resolution? The question is, Shall the resolution be agreed to?

The resolution was agreed to.

PAYMENT OF EMPLOYÉS.

Mr. MORGAN. I now ask to submit a resolution as a substitute for the resolution of the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK.] I believe we had progressed to the stage that the Senate agreed to reconsider the resolution of the Senator from Kentucky. The resolution to which mine applies was adopted on the 27th day of this month, and ordered the payment of a per diem to the employés of the Senate from the beginning of the month. I ask that the resolution which I offer as a substitute for that be now read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution of the Senator from Kentucky having been reconsidered is before the Senate, and the substitute proposed by the Senator from Alabama will be read.

The Acting Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, directed to pay the per diem employés of the Senate one month's pay, reckoning from the 10th day of October instant; the same to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let that go over, Mr. President.

Mr. MORGAN. I will inform the Senator from Vermont that this is a sustitute for the resolution of the Senator from Kentucky, which was agreed to by the Senate but which at my request was reconsidered this morning. A resolution was adopted on the 27th day of this month paying the per diem employés of the Senate for the month of October. That resolution was reconsidered by the Senate this morning and is now before the Senate. I offer this as a substitute for that. The purpose of the substitute is to secure to the per diem employés of the Senate a month's pay—the precise object that was sought to be attained by the original resolution, but the original resolution provided for the payment of those employés for the month of October, and one of the Comptrollers of the Treasury, as I understand it, holds that the employés cannot be paid for the month of October prior to the session of the Senate, and thereby the employés would lose one-third of the money that was intended to be applied to them by the original resolution, so that it becomes necessary to give them a month's pay, (the very purpose of the original resolution,) reckoning from the 10th day of October. That is the whole thing, merely to change the language of the original resolution so that the employés of the Senate may get what the Senate has actually voted to give them.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Why should they get more than for the time they have served?

Mr. MORGAN. It was the pleasure of the Senate to do that, and I suppose upon the idea of allowing for the time occupied by the boys and other employés of the Senate to come here from their homes and to return. We do not know precisely what time the Senate will adjourn, but granting that we may adjourn to-day or Monday, still the object of the original resolution as moved by the Senator from Kentucky was, as I understand it, to give them a month's pay because it was supposed to be their desert, they having been drawn from home to serve the Senate, and with the time required to return home, it certainly would cover, with the time we were in session, at least a month on an average; and I believe also that it has been the practice of the Senate to vote them a month's pay.

Mr. BECK. They have been here a month now, lacking ten days.

Mr. MORGAN. I know; and taking the time required for them to return home, most of them will be a full month in service including the time required for coming and returning.

Mr. BECK. What is the trouble with the present resolution?

Mr. MORGAN. None that I hear. The honorable Senator from Vermont made some inquiry about it and I have explained it.

Mr. BECK. What is the trouble with the former resolution?

Mr. MORGAN. The Comptroller of the Treasury refuses to allow the payment of the money from the commencement of the month to the 10th of October.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There is certainly a great deal of force in what the Senator from Alabama says concerning making good to the young gentlemen who are employed, as the phrase is, the time necessary to be covered in getting here and going away again, and I do not know that ten days or two weeks would be too much. If the compensation is so slender that we ought to add extra compensation to make up for the time employed in coming and going, or allow mileage, then of course in some way we ought to provide for it; but if the compensation is so great, as the compensation of Senators is supposed to be, that it leaves a very handsome and profitable margin for men with families that might be thought to be sufficient to cover the obvious necessity of persons who are Senators or employés in coming here to attend to their duties, excepting those Senators and employés who choose to be somewhere else of course, in which case perhaps they ought to be paid double!

Therefore I am not inclined to oppose this extension of time. It will be for the Treasury officers, of course, to decide whether this resolution of the Senate, not being a law, will justify the expenditure of public money. If the appropriation bills that have passed contain appropriations for the general contingent expenses of the Senate to be paid at its discretion by way of extra compensation to employés, or for time that they were not employed, then, of course, this resolution will be adequate to the end proposed; but if the appropriation bills for the contingent fund of the Senate provide for that fund by items and classes, with other provisions of law fix the salaries of the persons in question and provide them for the time actually employed, &c., then I am a little afraid that the Treasury officers may not find it easy to pass such accounts to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate. But of course, if the Senate shows its disposition to do this act, in case it should fail now on account of the want of a suitable appropriation, very likely at the next session of Congress both Houses may be got to assent to a law which will make it right.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to ask the Senator from Alabama whether there is not a prohibition of law against the payment by either House of extra compensation? I have not the statute before me.

Mr. MORGAN. Does the Senator ask whether there is not a general clause?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, a general law prohibiting the payment of money from the Treasury except under an appropriation by law.

Mr. MORGAN. I will say to the Senator from Ohio that an appropriation is made for the contingent expenses of the Senate, and this resolution authorizes the disbursing officer of the Senate to pay this allowance out of that fund.

Mr. SHERMAN. Has the Senate the power to authorize the disbursing officer to make the payment? I think there is some provision of law in regard to the conduct of the disbursing officer in such a case.

Mr. MORGAN. Unquestionably the Senate has a right to direct the payment of the contingent fund for any legitimate purpose to which it sees proper to apply the money.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have not examined the law recently.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from Alabama will recollect that a proposition the same in principle as this was made at the close of the last session, and on the question being raised by some Senator an examination was made—I think the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] will recollect the circumstance—and it was discovered that there was such a prohibition and that the money could only be voted by the authority of both Houses.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. That is true. If the Senator will look at the RECORD of the last session he will find the whole matter discussed there.

Mr. HOAR. I think such a statute was produced then.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. On one of the last days of the last session you will find that this very question was up and determined. The Senator from Ohio at the last session produced the law, I remember.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, there are two sections of the Revised Statutes relating to this matter, which I remember now to have directed the attention of the Senate to at the last called session. I will read them:

SEC. 1764. No allowance or compensation shall be made to any officer or clerk, by reason of the discharge of duties which belong to any other officer or clerk in the same or any other Department; and no allowance or compensation shall be made for any extra services whatever, which any officer or clerk may be required to perform, unless expressly authorized by law.

Then follows another section:

SEC. 1765. No officer in any branch of the public service, or any other person whose salary, pay, or emoluments are fixed by law or regulations, shall receive any additional pay, extra allowance, or compensation, in any form whatever, for the disbursement of public money, or for any other service or duty whatever, unless the same is authorized by law and the appropriation therefor explicitly states that it is for such additional pay, extra allowance, or compensation.

Mr. MORGAN. I was aware of those statutes, but they have no application here.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not know. I have not examined the subject fully.

Mr. MORGAN. These are not officers, but mere per diem employés; and then, again, this is not an extra compensation or allowance; it is a mere definition by resolution of the Senate of the period of time during which certain employés may draw pay and during which they shall be considered as in the employment of the Senate. It is intended by the resolution to extend that to one month so as to cover their actual service in coming and going and being in attendance on the Senate. That is the purport of the resolution; and, as I understand it, the Senate has never refused to pass a resolution fixing the period of time during which its employés might be paid by its disbursing officer. That is the whole purport of the resolution and it is not at all in conflict with the statutes.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the law fixes the price that shall be paid to pages and other employés at so much per day, I do not think it is within the power of the Senate under the statutes to enlarge that provision except by an act of appropriation agreed to by both Houses of Congress, which, to that extent, repeals these sections. However, if the Senate should pass this order it would be the duty of the First Comptroller to raise the question of law; and I trust that, unless the Senator is fully satisfied about the right of the Senate to do it, he will not undertake to do what is prohibited by law. I have not examined the question sufficiently to pass an opinion.

Mr. MORGAN. I have no doubt in my own mind of the power of the Senate to fix the pay of these employés and fix the term of service during which they shall be paid. We can employ them for ten days after the session adjourns and can pay them for that time. It makes no difference how long the recess is, we can fix the term of their service. I think there is no difficulty in the question at all. The Senate in adopting the resolution I now propose as a substitute is only following what it did a few days ago. It passed the same resolution, but it was in an imperfect form; and the object of this reconsideration is merely to get that difficulty out of the way respecting the time for the payment.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, I introduced the resolution the other day which seems to be defective, because it reads:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be directed to pay to the pages and the employés of the Senate who do not receive an annual salary full pay for the month of October, 1881, the same to be paid out of the miscellaneous items of the contingent fund of the Senate.

That passed. The difficulty I understand now is, that, as the Senate did not meet until the 10th day of October, the Comptroller of the Treasury, or some officer of that Department, has decided we could not pay in advance of the meeting. We all agree that the men who are receiving per diem pay, as the pages here, should certainly be considered as employed for a month. They have been in actual service now twenty days, I believe, and they have been coming here in our service, and will require time to go home. The necessary time for that makes up the thirty days. That seems to be agreed. We are not giving them any extra compensation; we are saying they have been in our employ for thirty days, and surely they have been or will be from the time they left their respective homes until they shall reach them again.

The Senator from Alabama very well said we can direct them to stay a week longer if we like, to clean up these halls and wait upon members and committees that may sit during the recess, or for any other purpose. It is simply a provision that the limit of their pay shall be thirty days though the Senate may not be in session for that length of time, though it comes very near it. If we adjourn to-day it is only ten days short, and many of them will necessarily be here some days afterwards, so that the thirty days will certainly be covered.

In addition to that, there is this to say about it: It is a great deal more meritorious case than the organization of thirty-nine committees that we have authorized at this session when not over ten of them have had anything to do, and thirty-odd clerks are drawing six dollars a day for committees that have never met and the members of which perhaps are not here. Thus we have all the machinery of thirty-odd useless committees. There is no complaint about that. Nearly $3,000 a day is taken out of the public Treasury in that way, and not a gentleman on the other side has found any fault with it. They have those clerks now, their own appointees for their own personal convenience, and I see no reason why the boys who are working as pages all the time should not be given this allowance.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to the passage of the resolution, because I think the pages ought to be paid for thirty days. I have not the slighest objection to the passage of the resolution if the Senate has the power to order the money to be paid. Unless Senators can see from the fair reading of the laws I have quoted that the Senate has the power by its own resolution to change the pay of officers whose pay is fixed by law, then, as a matter of course, we ought not to pass the resolution. We have the power, of course, to say how many committees shall employ clerks. There is no question of power there; it may be a question of propriety; the Senator from Kentucky stated it pretty strongly; but as to the other question whether this resolution should pass, that does not affect it. If we have no power to change the pay of pages, or to authorize them to be paid for time when they were not employed, we ought not to pass the resolution, because it is expressly prohibited by the plain language of the law. They are certainly employés or other persons engaged in the public service.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question before the Senate is on the amendment proposed to the resolution by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] in the nature of a substitute.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution having been read twice is in Committee of the Whole and still subject to amendment.

The resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. What is the further pleasure of the Senate?

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After three hours and thirty minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

COMMITTEE TO WAIT ON THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. SHERMAN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That a committee of two Senators be appointed by the presiding officer to wait upon the President of the United States and inquire if he has any other business to lay before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. SHERMAN and Mr. BAYARD as the committee.

THANKS TO PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE.

Mr. BAYARD submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent:

Resolved, That the thanks of the Senate are hereby tendered to the Hon. DAVID DAVIS for the courtesy, impartiality, and ability with which he has performed his duties as President pro tempore of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. HARRIS in the chair.) The question is on the resolution.

The resolution was unanimously agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT SINE DIE.

On motion of Mr. MAXEY, it was Ordered, That when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn without day.

FINAL ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. SHERMAN, from the committee appointed to wait upon the President of the United States and inform him that unless he may have some further communication to make the Senate is ready to adjourn without day, reported that the committee had performed the duty assigned them and that the President had replied that he had no further communication to make.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore, having resumed the chair, said: Senators, I am touched by the generous expressions in the resolution which it has pleased the Senate to pass in my honor; and I am grateful for the courteous co-operation which has been extended to me from all sides in administering the duties of presiding officer of this high and enlightened body.

Hoping that every member of the Senate will return happily and safely to his home and be permitted to resume his duties here at the next meeting of Congress, it only remains for me to declare the Senate adjourned without day.

The Senate thereupon (at four o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.) adjourned without day.
